On motion by Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, the Senate adjourned to one o'clock in the afternoon.

One o'clock in the afternoon.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and have elected JOHN W. TAYLOR, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, their Speaker, in the place of Henry Clay, resigned, and are ready to proceed to business; and that they have appointed a committee on their part to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses forthwith.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In communicating to you a just view of public affairs, at the commencement of your present labors, I do it with great satisfaction; because, taking all circumstances into consideration which claim attention, I see much cause to rejoice in the felicity of our situation. In making this remark, I do not wish to be understood to imply that an unvaried prosperity is to be seen in every interest of this great community. In the progress of a nation, inhabiting a territory of such vast extent and great variety of climate, every portion of which is engaged in foreign commerce, and liable to be affected, in some degree, by the changes which occur in the condition and regulations of foreign countries, it would be strange if the produce of our soil and the industry and enterprise of our fellow-citizens received at all times, and in every quarter, an uniform and equal encouragement. This would be more than we would have a right to expect, under circumstances the most favorable. Pressures on certain interests, it is admitted, has been felt; but allowing to these their greatest extent, they detract but little from the force of the remarks already made. In forming a just estimate of our present situation, it is proper to look at the whole, in the outline, as well as in the detail. A free, virtuous, and enlightened people know well the great principles and causes on which their happiness depends; and even those who suffer most, occasionally, in their transitory concerns, find great relief under their sufferings, from the blessings which they otherwise enjoy, and in the consoling and animating hope which they administer. From whence do these pressures come? Not from a Government which is founded by, administered for, and supported by the people. We trace them to the peculiar character of the epoch in which we live, and to the extraordinary occurrences which have signalized it. The convulsions with which several of the Powers of Europe have been shaken, and the long and destructive wars in which all were engaged, with their sudden transition to a state of peace, presenting, in the first instance, unusual encouragement to our commerce, and withdrawing it in the second, even within its wonted limit, could not fail to be sensibly felt here. The station, too, which we had to support through this long conflict, compelled as we were finally to become a party to it with a principal Power, and to make great exertions, suffer heavy losses, and to contract considerable debts, disturbing the ordinary course of affairs, by augmenting, to a vast amount, the circulating medium, and thereby elevating, at one time, the price of every article above a just standard, and depressing it at another below it, had likewise its due effect.

It is manifest that the pressures of which we complain have proceeded, in a great measure, from these causes. When, then, we take into view the prosperous and happy condition of our country, in all the great circumstances which constitute the felicity of a nation—every individual in the full enjoyment of all his rights: the Union blessed with plenty, and rapidly rising to greatness, under a national Government, which operates with complete effect in every part, without being felt in any, except by the ample protection which it affords, and under State governments which perform their equal share, according to a wise distribution of power between them, in promoting the public happiness—it is impossible to behold so gratifying, so glorious a spectacle, without being penetrated with the most profound and grateful acknowledgments to the Supreme Author of all good for such manifold and inestimable blessings. Deeply impressed with these sentiments, I cannot regard the pressures to which I have adverted otherwise than in the light of mild and instructive admonitions; warning us of dangers to be shunned in future; teaching us lessons of economy, corresponding with the simplicity and purity of our institutions, and best adapted to their support; evincing the connexion and dependence which the various parts of our happy Union have on each other, thereby augmenting daily our social incorporation, and adding, by its strong ties, new strength and vigor to the political; opening a wider range, and with new encouragement, to the industry and enterprise of our fellow-citizens at home and abroad; and more especially by the multiplied proofs which it has accumulated of the great perfection of our most excellent system of government, the powerful instrument, in the hands of our all-merciful Creator, in securing to us these blessings.

Happy as our situation is, it does not exempt us from solicitude and care for the future. On the contrary, as the blessings which we enjoy are great, proportionably great should be our vigilance, zeal, and activity, to preserve them. Foreign wars may again expose us to new wrongs, which would impose on us new duties, for which we ought to be prepared. The state of Europe is unsettled, and how long peace may be preserved is altogether uncertain; in addition to which, we have interests of our own to adjust, which will require particular attention. A correct view of our relations with each Power will enable you to form a just idea of existing difficulties, and of the measures of precaution best adapted to them.

Respecting our relations with Spain, nothing explicit can now be communicated. On the adjournment of Congress in May last, the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, at Madrid, was instructed to inform the Government of Spain that, if His Catholic Majesty should then ratify the treaty, this Government would accept the ratification, so far as to submit to the decision of the Senate, the question, whether such ratification should be received in exchange for that of the United States, heretofore given. By letters from the Minister of the United States to the Secretary of State, it appears that a communication, in conformity with his instructions, had been made to the Government of Spain, and that the Cortes had the subject under consideration. The result of the deliberations of that body, which is daily expected, will be made known to Congress as soon as it is received. The friendly sentiment which was expressed on the part of the United States, in the Message of the 9th of May last, is still entertained for Spain. Among the causes of regret, however, which are inseparable from the delay attending this transaction, it is proper to state that satisfactory information has been received, that measures have been recently adopted, by designing persons, to convert certain parts of the Province of Florida into depots for the reception of foreign goods, from whence to smuggle them into the United States. By opening a port within the limits of Florida, immediately on our boundary, where there was no settlement, the object could not be misunderstood. An early accommodation of differences will, it is hoped, prevent all such fraudulent and pernicious practices, and place the relations of the two countries on a very amicable and permanent basis.

The commercial relations between the United States and the British colonies in the West Indies, and on this continent, have undergone no change; the British Government still preferring to leave that commerce under the restriction heretofore imposed on it, on each side. It is satisfactory to recollect that the restraints resorted to by the United States were defensive only, intended to prevent a monopoly, under British regulations, in favor of Great Britain; as it likewise is to know that the experiment is advancing in a spirit of amity between the parties.

The question depending between the United States and Great Britain, respecting the construction of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, has been referred, by both Governments, to the decision of the Emperor of Russia, who has accepted the umpirage.

An attempt has been made with the Government of France, to regulate, by treaty, the commerce between the two countries, on the principle of reciprocity and equality. By the last communication from the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris, to whom full power had been given, we learn that the negotiation had been commenced there; but, serious difficulties having occurred, the French Government had resolved to transfer it to the United States, for which purpose the Minister Plenipotentiary of France had been ordered to repair to this city, and whose arrival might soon be expected. It is hoped that this important interest may be arranged on just conditions, and in a manner equally satisfactory to both parties. It is submitted to Congress to decide, until such arrangement is made, how far it may be proper, on the principle of the act of the last session, which augmented the tonnage duty on French vessels, to adopt other measures for carrying more completely into effect the policy of that act.

The act referred to, which imposed new tonnage on French vessels, having been in force from and after the first day of July, it has happened that several vessels of that nation which had been despatched from France before its existence was known, have entered the ports of the United States, and been subject to its operation, without that previous notice which the general spirit of our laws gives to individuals in similar cases. The object of that law having been merely to countervail the inequalities which existed to the disadvantage of the United States, in their commercial intercourse with France, it is submitted, also, to the consideration of Congress, whether, in the spirit of amity and conciliation which it is no less the inclination than the policy of the United States to preserve, in their intercourse with other Powers, it may not be proper to extend relief to the individuals interested in those cases, by exempting from the operation of the law all those vessels which have entered our ports without having had the means of previously knowing the existence of the additional duty.

The contest between Spain and the Colonies, according to the most authentic information, is maintained by the latter with improved success. The unfortunate divisions which were known to exist some time since, at Buenos Ayres, it is understood, still prevail. In no part of South America has Spain made any impression on the colonies, while, in many parts, and particularly in Venezuela and New Granada, the colonies have gained strength and acquired reputation, both for the management of the war, in which they have been successful, and for the order of the internal administration. The late change in the Government of Spain, by the re-establishment of the constitution of 1812, is an event which promises to be favorable to the Revolution. Under the authority of the Cortes, the Congress of Angostura was invited to open a negotiation for the settlement of differences between the parties, to which it was replied, that they would willingly open the negotiation, provided the acknowledgment of their independence was made its basis, but not otherwise. Of further proceedings between them we are uninformed. No facts are known to this Government, to warrant the belief, that any of the Powers of Europe will take part in the contest; whence, it may be inferred, considering all circumstances, which must have weight in producing the result, that an adjustment will finally take place, on the basis proposed by the colonies. To promote that result, by friendly counsels, with other Powers, including Spain herself, has been the uniform policy of this Government.

In looking to the internal concerns of our country, you will, I am persuaded, derive much satisfaction from a view of the several objects to which, in the discharge of your official duties, your attention will be drawn. Among these, none holds a more important place than the public revenue, from the direct operation of the power, by which it is raised, on the people, and by its influence in giving effect to every other power of the Government. The revenue depends on the resources of the country, and the facility by which the amount required is raised, is a strong proof of the extent of the resources, and the efficiency of the Government. A few prominent facts will place this great interest in a just light before you. On the 30th of September, 1815, the funded and floating debt of the United States was estimated at one hundred and nineteen millions six hundred and thirty-five thousand five hundred and fifty-eight dollars. If to this sum be added the amount of five per cent. stock subscribed to the Bank of the United States, the amount of Mississippi stock, and of the stock which was issued subsequently to that date, the balances ascertained to be due to certain States, for military services, and to individuals, for supplies furnished, and services rendered during the late war, the public debt may be estimated as amounting, at that date, and as afterwards liquidated, to one hundred and fifty-eight millions seven hundred and thirteen thousand forty-nine dollars. On the 30th of September, 1820, it amounted to ninety-one millions nine hundred and ninety-three thousand eight hundred and eighty-three dollars, having been reduced in that interval, by payments, sixty-six millions eight hundred and seventy-nine thousand one hundred and sixty-five dollars. During this term, the expenses of the Government of the United States were likewise defrayed, in every branch of the civil, military, and naval establishments; the public edifices in this city have been rebuilt, with considerable additions; extensive fortifications have been commenced, and are in a train of execution; permanent arsenals and magazines have been erected in various parts of the Union; our Navy has been considerably augmented, and the ordnance, munitions of war, and stores, of the Army and Navy, which were much exhausted during the war, have been replenished.

By the discharge of so large a proportion of the public debt, and the execution of such extensive and important operations, in so short a time, a just estimate may be formed of the great extent of our national resources. The demonstration is the more complete and gratifying, when it is recollected that the direct tax and excise were repealed soon after the termination of the late war, and that the revenue applied to these purposes has been derived almost wholly from other resources.

The receipts into the Treasury, from every source, to the 30th of September last, have amounted to sixteen millions seven hundred and ninety-four thousand one hundred and seven dollars and sixty-six cents; whilst the public expenditures, to the same period, amounted to sixteen millions eight hundred and seventy-one thousand five hundred and thirty-four dollars and seventy-two cents; leaving in the Treasury, on that day, a sum estimated at one million nine hundred and fifty thousand dollars. For the probable receipts of the following year, I refer you to the statement which will be transmitted from the Treasury.

The sum of three millions of dollars, authorized to be raised by loan, by an act of the last session of Congress, has been obtained upon terms advantageous to the Government, indicating, not only an increased confidence in the faith of the nation, but the existence of a large amount of capital seeking that mode of investment, at a rate of interest not exceeding five per centum per annum.

It is proper to add, that there is now due to the Treasury, for the sale of public lands, twenty-two millions nine hundred and ninety-six thousand five hundred and forty-five dollars. In bringing this subject to view, I consider it my duty to submit to Congress, whether it may not be advisable to extend to the purchasers of these lands, in consideration of the unfavorable change which has occurred since the sales, a reasonable indulgence. It is known that the purchases were made when the price of every article had risen to its greatest height, and that the instalments are becoming due at a period of great depression. It is presumed that some plan may be devised, by the wisdom of Congress, compatible with the public interest, which would afford great relief to these purchasers.

Considerable progress has been made, during the present season, in examining the coast and its various bays and other inlets; in the collection of materials, and in the construction of fortifications for the defence of the Union, at several of the positions at which it has been decided to erect such works. At Mobile Point and Dauphin Island, and at the Rigolets, leading to Lake Pontchartrain, materials to a considerable amount have been collected and all the necessary preparations made for the commencement of the works. At Old Point Comfort, at the mouth of James river, and at the Rip-Rap, on the opposite shore, in the Chesapeake Bay, materials to a vast amount have been collected; and at the Old Point some progress has been made in the construction of the fortification, which is on a very extensive scale. The work at Fort Washington, on this river, will be completed early in the next Spring; and that on the Pea Patch, in the Delaware, in the course of the next season. Fort Diamond, at the Narrows, in the harbor of New York, will be finished this year. The works at Boston, New York, Baltimore, Norfolk, Charleston, and Niagara, have been in part repaired; and the coast of North Carolina, extending south to Cape Fear, has been examined, as have likewise other parts of the coast eastward of Boston. Great exertions have been made to push forward these works with the utmost despatch possible; but, when their extent is considered, with the important purposes for which they are intended, the defence of the whole coast, and in consequence of the whole interior, and that they are to last for ages, it will be manifest that a well-digested plan, founded on military principles, connecting the whole together, combining security with economy, could not be prepared without repeated examinations of the most exposed and difficult parts, and that it would also take considerable time to collect the materials at the several points where they would be required. From all the light that has been shed on this subject, I am satisfied that every favorable anticipation which has been formed of this great undertaking will be verified, and that when completed it will afford very great, if not complete, protection to our Atlantic frontier in the event of another war; a protection sufficient to counterbalance in a single campaign with an enemy powerful at sea the expense of all these works, without taking into the estimate the saving of the lives of so many of our citizens, the protection of our towns and other property, or the tendency of such works to prevent war.

Our military positions have been maintained at Belle Point, on the Arkansas, at Council Bluffs, on the Missouri, at St. Peter's, on the Mississippi, and at Green Bay, on the Upper lakes. Commodious barracks have already been erected at most of these posts, with such works as were necessary for their defence. Progress has also been made in opening communications between them, and in raising supplies at each for the support of the troops by their own labor, particularly those most remote.

With the Indians peace has been preserved, and a progress made in carrying into effect the act of Congress, making an appropriation for their civilization, with the prospect of favorable results. As connected equally with both these objects, our trade with those tribes is thought to merit the attention of Congress. In their original state, game is their sustenance and war their occupation: and if they find no employment from civilized Powers, they destroy each other. Left to themselves, their extirpation is inevitable. By a judicious regulation of our trade with them, we supply their wants, administer to their comforts, and gradually, as the game retires, draw them to us. By maintaining posts far in the interior, we acquire a more thorough and direct control over them; without which it is confidently believed that a complete change in their manners can never be accomplished. By such posts, aided by a proper regulation of our trade with them, and a judicious civil administration over them, to be provided for by law, we shall it is presumed be enabled not only to protect our own settlements from their savage incursions, and preserve peace among the several tribes, but accomplish also the great purpose of their civilization.

Considerable progress has also been made in the construction of ships of war, some of which have been launched in the course of the present year.

Our peace with the Powers on the coast of Barbary has been preserved, but we owe it altogether to the presence of our squadron in the Mediterranean. It has been found equally necessary to employ some of our vessels for the protection of our commerce in the Indian sea, the Pacific, and along the Atlantic coast. The interests which we have depending in those quarters, which have been much improved of late, are of great extent, and of high importance to the nation, as well as to the parties concerned, and would undoubtedly suffer if such protection was not extended to them. In execution of the law of the last session, for the suppression of the slave trade, some of our public ships have also been employed on the coast of Africa, where several captures have already been made of vessels engaged in that disgraceful traffic.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, November 14, 1820.

The Message was read, and three thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

THURSDAY, November 16.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to alter the terms of the district court in Alabama, and the bill was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. WALKER, of Alabama, BURRILL, and KING, of Alabama, were appointed the committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 16th instant, respecting the compensation of the members and delegates of Congress, and the further consideration thereof was postponed until next Monday week.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution for the appointment of a joint committee on the arrangements for the Library of Congress, and having agreed thereto, Messrs. DICKERSON, DANA, and HUNTER, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of Chaplains, and have appointed the Rev. J. N. CAMPBELL, Chaplain on their part.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the election of a Chaplain on their part; and, on counting the ballots, it appeared that the Rev. WILLIAM RYLAND was duly elected.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting copies of the reports of the Land Commissioners at Jackson Courthouse, and a copy of a letter, dated 17th August, 1820, which accompanied them; which were read.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 3d April, 1820, directing him to "cause to be prepared, and laid before the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a statement of money annually appropriated, and paid, since the Declaration of Independence, for purchasing from the Indians, surveying, and selling the public lands, showing, as near as may be, the quantities of land which have been purchased, the number of acres which have been surveyed, the number sold, and the number which remain unsold; the amount of sales, the amount of forfeitures, the sums paid by purchasers, and the sums due from purchasers and from receivers in each land district;" and the report was read.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, directing him to "cause to be prepared, and laid before the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a statement of the money which has been annually appropriated and paid, since the year seventeen hundred and seventy-five, for surveying the seacoast, bays, inlets, harbors, and shoals, and for erecting, and keeping in repair, lighthouses, beacons, buoys, and for the purchase of ground for lighthouses, distinguishing the places where they have been erected, and the sums annually expended for keeping and supplying the same," and the report was read.

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, November 20.

JOHN ELLIOTT, and also, FREEMAN WALKER, from the State of Georgia, severally arrived, on the 17th instant, and attended this day.

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, from the committee to whom was referred the bill to alter the terms of the district court in Alabama, reported the same without amendment, and it was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment having been proposed thereto, it was reported to the House; and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, submitted the following motions for consideration:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide for the relief of purchasers of the public lands, by dividing the sums now severally unpaid, exclusive of interest, into — equal instalments; each instalment bearing interest only from the time at which it shall be made payable.

Resolved, That it is expedient to permit such purchasers of the public lands as may elect that mode, to surrender, within — months from and after the — day of — next, their certificates, which shall be cancelled, and the lands shall be taken to have reverted and become forfeited to the United States, and shall be advertised, and sold for cash at public auction, to the highest bidder, in the same manner as other public lands. They shall not be sold for less than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, which sum shall go to the use of the United States, in addition to the sums already paid; but if said lands should be so resold for more than one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, the excess shall be paid to the person surrendering the certificate, provided such excess shall never be greater than the amount actually paid on such lands before such surrender.

Resolved, That it is expedient to permit such purchasers of the public lands as may elect that mode, to extinguish their debt, complete their titles, and demand and receive patents, by paying, within the period of one year from and after the — day of — next, into their respective land offices, five-eighths of the original price at which their lands were purchased, including interest, and computing the moneys already paid as part of the said final payment of five-eighths.

Resolved, That it is expedient, in addition to the privilege contemplated in the preceding resolution, to permit such purchasers of the public lands as may elect that mode, at any time within the said period of one year from and after the — day of — next, to forfeit and abandon to the United States such fractions, quarter sections, and half quarter sections, as they may deem fit; and to transfer and apply the moneys already paid on the tract or tracts so forfeited to the payment for such other fraction, quarter section, or half quarter section as they may choose to retain; and in cases where the purchaser has bought only one quarter section, he shall be permitted to divide it, and make his election between its halves—such division being made by a north and south line according to law.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of State of the United States, requesting an additional supply of documents, printed by order of the Senate; and the letter was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate resumed the consideration of Mr. SANFORD's motions of the 17th instant, for referring to various committees the Message of the President of the United States; and agreed thereto.

STATE OF NEW YORK,

Whereas the Legislature of this State, at the last session, did instruct their Senators and request their Representatives in Congress to oppose the admission, as a State into the Union, of any Territory not comprised within the original boundaries of the United States, without making the prohibition of slavery therein an indispensable condition of admission: And whereas this Legislature is impressed with the correctness of the sentiments so communicated to our Senators and Representatives; therefore,

And that our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives in Congress be requested, to use their utmost exertions to prevent the acceptance and confirmation of any such constitution.

Bank of the United States.

SENATE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 29th ult. for an inquiry into the application of the appropriations for public improvements in the city of Washington, and agreed thereto; and Messrs. ROBERTS, MILLS, BURWELL, OTIS, and LLOYD, were appointed the committee.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of the Bank of the United States, which, after some introductory matter, concludes by submitting the following points, on which they ask relief and protection from Congress:

"1st. The charter provides that no director, except the President, shall be eligible for more than three years in four. This provision has, in practice, been found to deny to the bank the services of those men who are best qualified to administer its affairs with safety and profit to the institution. It is a provision not contained, your petitioners believe, in the charter of any respectable banking institution. It was not contained in the charter of the former Bank of the United States, and it would seem that the provision of the charter which forbids the re-election of more than three-fourths of the directors in office at the time of an annual election (to which your petitioners have no objection) is calculated to effect all the ends of the embarrassing provision from which your petitioners now crave relief.

"2d. At present there is no authority under the laws of Congress to punish any fraud, speculation, or violation of trust, committed by any of the officers of the bank or its offices, and on this point the State laws are also supposed to be deficient. Nor is there any adequate civil remedy for the bank against its faithless agents who may, the hour before their dismissal from office, while the investigations necessary to their removal indicate to them that result, take the property of the bank from its vaults, and withhold it, and, if they please, give it in payment to their other creditors, in exclusion of the bank from which it has been thus purloined.

"3d. Under the charter, it has been doubted whether the bank has power to authorize the issuing of notes not signed by the President and countersigned by the cashier. The labor and the time necessary to sign notes for the bank and all its branches, are much greater than either of those officers can bestow upon that object, and hence the bank has been unable to put in circulation a sufficient amount of notes of the smaller denominations, which the public most want, and which are best calculated to serve the interest of the bank. If authority were given to the board, from time to time, to appoint one or more persons to sign notes of the smaller denominations, at the parent bank, under the superintendence and direction of the board and its principal officers, there would be no public risk, and it would afford all the aid which your petitioners desire on the point.

"4th. Under the 14th section of the act incorporating the bank, the bills or notes of the bank originally made payable, or which shall have become payable, on demand, are made receivable in all payments to the United States, unless otherwise directed by act of Congress. Under this regulation, the power of the bank to make its capital available, either for its own profit or the public good, is greatly abridged. The sphere of its circulation is limited to those places where it is least wanted, and made to exclude those where it would be eminently useful, while the whole currency of vast sections of the country is thereby frequently greatly embarrassed."

The memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

MONDAY, December 4.

WILLIAM PINKNEY, from the State of Maryland, took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. BARBOUR presented the petition of John B. Timberlake, praying that, in the liquidation of his accounts with the Navy Department, a just allowance may be made to him for certain losses unavoidably sustained whilst purser of the frigates "United States" and "President," and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the memorial of the General Assembly of Louisiana, praying the grant of certain lands therein described, for certain public purposes; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, presented the memorial of Daniel W. Coxe, praying to be confirmed in his title to a tract of land in the State of Louisiana; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the managers of the National Vaccine Institution in the District of Columbia;" the bill entitled "An act for the relief of Perley Keyes and Jason Fairbank;" the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Elias Parks;" and the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis,'" and, also, a resolution authorizing the President of the United States to cause astronomical observations to be made, to ascertain the longitude of the Capitol in the City of Washington, from some known meridian in Europe; in which bills and resolution they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The four bills and resolution last brought up for concurrence were read, and severally passed to a second reading.

mittee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Robert Purdy; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to Thursday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for locating military land warrants in the State of Ohio.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

The Senate, according to the order of the day, took up the resolution submitted by Mr. BURRILL on the 16th ultimo, to reduce the compensation of members of Congress to six dollars a day.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, observed that he had no doubt the ultimate fate of this proposition would be indefinite postponement. As he did not, however, desire a discussion of the subject at present, he would not make that motion, but would move its postponement until next Monday week, the 18th instant; which motion was agreed to, and the resolution was postponed accordingly.

PUNISHMENT OF PIRACY.

The resolution submitted by Mr. BARBOUR, on Friday last, was taken up, and having been modified by the mover, so as to direct an inquiry into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to commute the capital punishment of piracy by confinement in penitentiary houses, in such cases as he may deem expedient—

Mr. BARBOUR proceeded to give, at considerable length, his views in support of the object of his motion. He entered into a general defence of the superiority of the penitentiary system of punishment over the old code, contrasting the mildness and good effects of the one, with the cruelty, yet ineffectual operation, of the other—maintaining the great superiority of the former, not only in its humanity, but in its salutary effects on the subject of the punishment, as well as in its example on society—and referring to facts and experience in some of the States, Virginia particularly, compared with the effects of the bloody code in England and this country, to sustain his opinions.

The resolution was agreed to without objection.

ADMISSION OF MISSOURI.

The Senate, according to the order of the day, proceeded to the consideration of the resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, (chairman of the select committee which reported the resolution,) observed that the resolution was conformable to those adopted on similar occasions heretofore, and he hoped there would be no difficulty or delay in its passage. The constitution of the new State was republican, and no objection, he presumed, could arise to it: it was unnecessary to detain the Senate with any remarks on the subject, unless any explanations were desired by gentlemen, which he would with pleasure afford, so far as he was able. He trusted the resolution would now be acted on, and the members from the new State, who had been waiting for a considerable time, be admitted to their seats in the National Councils.

Mr. EATON, of Tennessee, disclaimed any disposition to create delay on this subject; but it was proper, Mr. E. said, that the mind of every member should be satisfied on a question of so much importance before he was called on to give his vote. His own mind, he confessed, was not satisfied; and, to obtain time for reflection, and to mature his opinion on it, he should move to postpone the resolution to a future day. At present, he repeated, he was not prepared to vote either in the affirmative or negative, with the conviction of being right. There were controverted points in the constitution presented by the new State, and he wished to see whether it was in all respects conformable to the Constitution of the United States. Another reason which Mr. E. offered in favor of a postponement of the question here, was, that the House of Representatives (if he might refer to its proceedings without being out of order) had fixed on Wednesday next for going into the consideration of the subject, and he did not consider it expedient or proper for both Houses to be discussing the same question contemporaneously. He deemed it a more eligible course that the subject should be acted on in one House first, and then be taken up in the other. To obtain time for himself, however, as he at first intimated, he should ask the Senate to postpone the resolution to Wednesday next only, and accordingly made a motion to that effect.

Mr. SMITH would not oppose the motion, but he objected to that reason of the gentleman, for postponement, which referred to the purposes of the other House. There was no such comity due to that House from this, as to wait until it had decided a question before it should be taken up here. This opinion was not incompatible with perfect respect for the other House; and such an argument ought not to govern the Senate or any other body. This question, Mr. S. remarked, had, in another shape, at the last session occupied a vast portion of the time of the Senate, and there was no authority for believing that the present would be a debated question. If gentlemen had any objections to the constitution, let them state them at once, and it would then be known whether any discussion was to ensue. Heretofore, States had come into the Union without being stopped at the threshold. He referred to the State of Indiana, in 1816; while the resolution for the admission of Indiana was under progress in the Senate, the House of Representatives had the member from that State in his seat debating and voting. There was no reason why the Senate, in the present case, should wait for the other House; let this branch go on and decide whether the new members have a right to their seats. It was only when this ill-fated Missouri presented itself for admission, that a desire was expressed for procrastination and delay. He hoped the Senate would not agree to the motion, unless divested of the reason given by the mover in relation to the other House.

Admission of Missouri.

SENATE.

Mr. EATON replied that the argument objected to by the gentleman from South Carolina, had been merely thrown out by him from an impression that it was not proper for both Houses to be acting on the subject at one and the same moment. It was strange, however, he thought, that the gentleman should object to the motion solely because in his opinion one bad argument was offered in its favor. It was singular that a proposition admitted to have sufficient good reasons in its support, should be opposed by the gentleman merely because the arguments for it concluded with a bad one. He had stated that he entertained doubts on the question, and he only desired one or two days for reflection, and to make up an opinion. He concluded by varying his motion for postponement to Thursday next.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, felt no reluctance to postpone the subject for the gentleman's accommodation, but he would not consent to the postponement for the reason that the Senate ought to wait the decision of the other House, because the latter reason might operate to the postponement of the question here altogether, or at least for a considerable period beyond the time now proposed. His only motive for objecting to the motion was on account of the latter argument urged by the gentleman from Tennessee. If the gentleman wanted time merely to mature his opinion, let him move the postponement from day to day, until he had made up his mind on the question. Mr. J. said the question to be decided was one of great importance; it swallowed up, in fact, every other, and until it was settled, they could not well go on with the ordinary business of the session. He was unwilling, therefore, to postpone it on a motion accompanied by a reason that might call for still further delay. He was not willing to wait for the other House, as he deemed it right and proper for the Senate to decide the question as early as possible; sufficient delay had already taken place, and he hoped the gentleman would change his motion to a postponement until to-morrow only. If he should not then be prepared for the question, Mr. J. said he would agree to give him further time.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, was never opposed to allowing gentlemen time to make up their opinions on all matters of deliberation; but in this case he concurred with Messrs. SMITH and JOHNSON, in their opposition to the motion, for the reasons they had assigned. The argument used by Mr. EATON, that it was proper to wait the decision of the other House, amounted almost to an indefinite postponement of the subject here. He was averse to delay on that ground. The question, he thought, had been forever sealed at the last session; so fully was he persuaded of this, that he had supposed accursed would have been the hand that should again open this fountain of bitter waters. Mr. B. then proceeded into a brief argument to show that it was right and proper, under every consideration of courtesy towards the members from the new State, now kept waiting at the bar for admission, and towards the State itself, to decide the question without more delay. A contrary course, he urged, would be a departure from the proceeding in all pre-existing cases; and he could not believe that a mere technical exception could operate on the wisdom of the Senate, of which he entertained the most exalted opinion, to prevent it from eternally burying the brand of discord which had been lighted up at the last session. Mr. B. said, as there was no good reason for the postponement asked for, he must vote against it. He hoped the time would never come when the opinion of this body, solemnly expressed, would not have a great moral effect out of doors as well as in doors. This question was looked at by the nation with much anxiety and some degree of alarm, and he hoped the Senate would not keep the public mind in suspense, but decide it without delay.

Mr. EATON having again varied his motion to its original shape, for Wednesday—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, as the gentleman had placed his motion on the ground of personal indulgence, he would cheerfully withdraw his opposition to the postponement, as he was always ready to accord to any gentleman reasonable time for preparation.

Mr. SMITH concurred with Mr. JOHNSON in this sentiment, and, for the same reason, would not oppose the postponement to Wednesday.

Mr. EATON added a few words explanatory of his reasons for asking a short delay. His health had not been good, and he had not possessed the opportunity of satisfying his mind on some points involved in the decision of the question. He thought opposition to such a motion was unusual, and that when any gentleman asked further time it was always granted, even when the question was one of inconsiderable importance; but, on a question of such acknowledged magnitude, it was still more extraordinary that the indulgence he asked should have been opposed. He wanted no time to prepare a great harangue, for he should probably pass over the question silently; but it was to see if a measure which he was called to vote on would violate the instrument which he had sworn to observe.

Mr. SMITH rose again, merely to correct the gentleman as to a fact. The gentleman had stated that time was never refused to a member when he asked for it; but Mr. S. recollected, on one occasion, he himself, late in the day, asked the Senate to postpone the question on the bank only to the next day, and was refused; and, so far from indulging him, they took the question over his head, while he was in the midst of a speech on the subject.

The question was then taken on postponing the resolution to Wednesday, and was agreed to, nem. con.

Mr. RUGGLES presented two memorials, signed by a number of individuals concerned directly or indirectly, as purchasers of public lands, prior to the law "making further provision for the sale of the public lands," stating that said law operates injuriously on them, and praying that they may be permitted to apply the payments already made to such portions of their entries as such payments will cover, at two dollars per acre, and that the residue may revert to the United States; and the memorials were read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PINKNEY presented the petition of John Gooding and James Williams, late owners of the private armed schooner "Midas," praying that they may be paid the bounty allowed by law to the owners of private armed vessels for the capture and delivery of prisoners, on twenty-two slaves that formed part of the crew of the British privateer "Dash," captured in the year 1814, by the "Midas;" and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Elderkin Potter, praying compensation for a horse lost whilst in the service of the United States; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

CASE OF MATTHEW LYON.

Mr. BARBOUR from the committee to whom was referred the petition of Matthew Lyon, submitted the following report; which was read:

The claim of the petitioner to redress rests on the facts, that he was convicted under the law commonly called the sedition act, and suffered in his body by a long and loathsome confinement in jail, and in his estate by the payment of a large fine. He asserts that the law under which he suffered was unconstitutional; and proceeds to infer that when a citizen has been injured by an unconstitutional stretch of power he is entitled to indemnity.

Although this be the case of an individual, its correct decision involves general principles, so highly important as to claim a profound consideration.

Under this solemn impression, a majority of the committee, after the severest investigation, have decided that the petitioner is entitled to relief.

They owe it to themselves and to the occasion to present succinctly to the Senate some of the prominent reasons which have produced this determination. The first question that naturally presents itself in the investigation is, Was the law Constitutional? The committee have no hesitation in pronouncing, in their opinion, it was not. They think it is not necessary at this day to enter into an elaborate disquisition to sustain the correctness of this opinion. They will content themselves by referring to the history of the times in which the law originated, when both its constitutionality and expediency underwent the strictest scrutiny. The opponents of the law challenged its advocates to point out the clause of the Constitution which had armed the Government with so formidable a power as the control of, or interference with, the press. A Government, said they, of limited powers, and authorized to execute such only as are expressly given by the Constitution, or such as are properly incident to an express power, and necessary to its execution, has exercised an authority over a most important subject, which, so far from having been delegated, has been expressly withheld. That the patriots contemporary with the adoption of the Constitution, not content with the universally received opinion, that all power not granted had been withheld, to obviate all doubt on a point of such moment, insisted that an amendment to that effect should be inserted in the Constitution; and still jealous of that propensity, incident to all Governments, no matter what may be the form of its organization, or by whom administered, to enlarge the sphere of its authority, they, by express provisions, guarded from violation some of the cardinal principles of liberty; among these, as most important, they placed the liberty of conscience and of the press. Profoundly versed in the history of human affairs, whose every page made known that all Governments had seized on the altar and the press, and prostituted them into the most formidable engines against the liberty of mankind, they resolved, and most wisely so, as the sequel has evinced, to surround these great, natural, and inalienable rights by impassable barriers; and, to that end, have expressly declared, that Congress should have no power to legislate on them; and, notwithstanding these great obstacles, you have passed this act. The advocates of the law vainly endeavored to defend themselves by a technical discrimination between the liberty and licentiousness of the press. The American people, by overwhelming majorities, approaching, indeed, unanimity, denounced the law as a palpable and an alarming infraction of the Constitution; and, although no official record of that decision can be produced, it is as notorious as a change of their public servants, which took place at that time, and to which this obnoxious measure so essentially contributed.

DECEMBER, 1820.

Case of Matthew Lyon.

SENATE.

The committee cannot withhold an expression of regret, that, upon the restoration of sound principles, the Congress of the times should have omitted to leave some memorial on their records, of their disapprobation of this unjustifiable assumption of power; and none would have been more satisfactory than an ample indemnity to those who had suffered by its operation. In the fluctuating conflicts between power and liberty, which exist everywhere, in a greater or lesser degree, where any portion of liberty is to be found, it is believed, by the committee, to be a most solemn duty imposed on the defenders of the latter, in every triumph it may acquire over the encroachments of the former, to make certain every doubtful point, to which resort had been had as a pretext for such encroachment; to repair every breach made in the Constitution; and, if practicable, to surround liberty with new ramparts. That having been omitted by our predecessors, in the instance of the sedition act, the task devolves on us. And although it has been long delayed, the regret arising therefrom is, in some degree, lessened by the reflection that the decision now to be pronounced, when the angry passions of party have subsided, will be dictated by an exclusive regard to the intrinsic merits of the question, and the interesting consideration it involves.

The committee are aware, that, in opposition to this view of the subject, the decision of some of the judges of the Supreme Court, sustaining the constitutionality of the law, has been frequently referred to, as sovereign and conclusive of the question.

The committee entertain a high respect for the purity and intelligence of the judiciary. But it is a rational respect, limited by a knowledge of the frailty of human nature, and the theory of the Constitution, which declares, not only that judges may err in opinion, but also may commit crimes, and hence has provided a tribunal for the trial of offenders.

In times of violent party excitement, agitating a whole nation, to expect that judges will be entirely exempt from its influence, argues a profound ignorance of mankind. Although clothed with the ermine, they are still men, and carry into the judgment seat the passions and motives common to their kind. Their decisions, on party questions, reflect their individual opinions, which frequently betray them unconsciously into error. To balance the judgment of a whole people, by that of two or three men, no matter what may be their official elevation, is to exalt the creature of the Constitution above its creator, and to assail the foundation of our political fabric, which is, that the decision of the people is infallible, from which there is no appeal, but to Heaven.

Taking it, therefore, as granted, that the law was unconstitutional, we are led to the next question, growing out of the inquiry, is the petitioner entitled to relief? This question, as a general one, is not susceptible of that precise answer, which might establish a uniform rule, applying equally to all times, and to all occasions. On the contrary, it must be decided by the peculiar circumstances of every case to which its application is attempted.

The committee, for instance, would themselves decide that relief was impracticable, where, from a long course of tyranny, attended with a rapacity far and wide, society had become so impoverished that the attempt to relieve might blight every prospect of future prosperity. Nor could they advocate relief, where the authority exercised admitted of a rational doubt as to its constitutionality, upon powers not expressly inhibited, nor in cases, perhaps, where the amount of the injuries complained of could not be ascertained with a reasonable precision. None of these difficulties, however, present themselves in this case. The law under which the petitioner suffered, as has been previously asserted, and attempted to be shown, was palpably unconstitutional, as being directly in opposition to an express clause of the Constitution. The amount of the injury sustained, in so far as relates to the fine paid by the petitioner, is fixed and certain, and the sum equal to a reimbursement is insignificant to the nation. In this case, therefore, the committee think the Government is under a moral obligation to indemnify the petitioner. An indemnity as consistent with policy as with justice, inculcating an instructive lesson to the oppressor and the oppressed. Successful usurpation yields, indeed, to but few checks; among the few is the justice to posterity, who take cognizance equally of the crimes of the usurper, and of the sufferings and the virtue of his victim—condemning the former, and administering relief to the latter. And what more consolatory to the suffering patriot, what better calculated to inspire constancy and courage, than a conviction, founded on fact, that his wrongs, on the restoration of sound principles, will attract the regard of the successful asserters of freedom, and who will cheerfully indemnify him for the injuries he has sustained? Such examples are not wanting in Governments less beneficent than ours—that of England is replete with instances of this kind. Acts of Parliament, passed in times of heat and excitement, are frequently reversed, and the individuals on whom they had operated are restored to the rights of which they had been deprived. Succeeding Parliaments do not hesitate to indemnify the victims of oppression, because they had suffered under the forms of law. Acts of their Legislature, whose power is omnipotent, form no obstacle with those to whom their injustice is made manifest, in granting relief. An American Congress will not suffer itself to be exceeded by any Government in acts of justice or beneficence.

The committee have only further to remark, that the Executive interposed its authority in various cases, and granted a full pardon to those convicted under the act in question, by which their fines were either remitted, or restored; relief, therefore, to the petitioner, would be only a common measure of justice. According to information received from the Department of State, no money has ever been paid into the Treasury by the officer who received the fines imposed under the sedition act. It is submitted to the discretion of the Senate, whether provision shall be made by law to indemnify the petitioner, by directing the amount of his fine to be paid out of the Treasury, or to reclaim it from the delinquent officer or officers; and, in the latter event, to be at liberty to use the name of the United States in any prosecution to which resort may be had, with a view to that end.

Inasmuch, however, as the relief proposed to be given in this case is on general principles, the committee are of opinion it should be afforded also to every sufferer under the law.

They, therefore, beg leave to submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That so much of the act, entitled "An act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States," approved the 14th of July, 1798, as pretends to prescribe and punish libels, is unconstitutional.

Resolved, That the fines collected under that act ought to be restored to those from whom they were exacted; and that these resolutions be recommitted to the committee who brought them in, with instructions to report a bill to that effect.

WEDNESDAY, December 6.

Mr. TRIMBLE presented three memorials, signed by a number of individuals concerned directly or indirectly, as purchasers of public lands, prior to the law "making further provision for the sale of the public lands," stating that said law operates injuriously on them, and praying that they may be permitted to apply the payments already made to such portions of their entries as such payments will cover, at two dollars per acre, and that the residue may revert to the United States; and the memorials were read, and severally referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EATON presented the petition of Thomas Hardiman, of Missouri, praying to be confirmed in his title to a tract of land in Missouri; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HOLMES, of Mississippi, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to continue in force, for a further time, the act entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;" and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. TRIMBLE gave notice, that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to bring in a bill to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out a canal in the State of Ohio.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, requesting information of the President of the United States respecting the execution of the act "authorizing the purchase of fire engines and for building houses for the safe-keeping of the same;" and agreed thereto.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of allowing to officers a specific sum monthly in lieu of their present pay, rations, and other emoluments; and agreed thereto.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of establishing an additional land office in Indiana; and agreed thereto.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the select committee on the petition of Matthew Lyon; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to and made the order of the day for Wednesday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Illinois three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same;" and the consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate took up the motion of the fourth instant, requesting an inquiry into the expediency of extending the time for locating military land warrants in Ohio; which was amended and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be requested to inquire into the expediency of extending the time for locating military land warrants in the State of Ohio.

COLUMBIAN SOCIETY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to incorporate "the Columbian Society for Literary purposes."

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted a general view of the character of the association and its objects, to establish its laudable and unobjectionable nature; and, by comparing it with other incorporations created by Congress, argued to show that it was entirely unexceptionable, being merely the incorporation of the managers of a college erected purely for the promotion of those branches of education which were taught in other institutions of learning. The same bill, Mr. J. remarked, had been defeated at the last session, merely because the title, which had been inadvertently and without reflection given to it, had been construed by gentlemen into an indication that the bill was for the incorporation of an exclusive religious society for religious objects alone. Mr. J. concluded by moving to postpone the bill to Friday next, that it might not now interfere with business of more importance, and to give time for considering it.

Mr. HORSEY avowed himself willing to vote for the incorporation of this society, under certain limitations and restrictions, in which the bill was now defective. He would confine the society, by express provisions, to objects strictly collegiate and literary. The bill was defective in not defining the mode of electing its principal, its trustees, professors, &c., and he would provide especially that no person should be excluded from an office in the college, or from its benefits, on account of his religious opinions. These were objects he wished to provide for in the bill, and therefore would wish it to be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, concurred entirely in the views of Mr. HORSEY, and acquiesced in its recommitment; and the bill was recommitted accordingly.

The other intervening subjects on the orders of the day being, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, postponed for that purpose—

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the admission into the Union of the STATE OF MISSOURI.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, rose merely to suggest, as there was no doubt the mind of every gentleman was fully made up on the subject, that the question should be decided without consuming the time of the Senate in further debate.

Mr. EATON, of Tennessee, said, before the question was taken, he would ask leave to offer the following proviso to the resolution:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the assent of Congress to any provision in the constitution of Missouri, if any such there be, which contravenes that clause in the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Mr. KING, of New York, thought this amendment of too much importance to be decided without a moment's reflection. Some little time, he thought, ought to be allowed to see its bearing; to see whether it meant any thing or nothing, and, if any thing, what that was. He hoped the question would be postponed at least until to-morrow.

Mr. EATON observed, that there was a feature in the constitution of Missouri which presented a difficulty to the minds of some gentlemen, and to his among the number. Doubts were entertained whether that constitution was not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and some might not be willing to adopt the unconditional terms of the resolution which declared the new constitution to be republican, and in conformity to the Constitution of the United States. It was to obviate difficulty on this point, by avoiding a declaration one way or the other on the questionable clause, that he offered the amendment.

Mr. KING, of New York, confessed himself at some loss how to decide on this amendment. If he voted in the affirmative, it might seem as if the Senate could pass a resolution contrary to the Constitution; if in the negative, it would declare that a clause should have no effect which could have none, and must be nugatory. He thought a day, at least, should be given to consider the matter. For himself, he had asked no delay of the resolution; he was ready to vote on it; and he took this occasion to say he had not desired the subject to be reopened in the Senate; he believed it would do no good, but, on the contrary, that the public tranquillity would be promoted by deciding it quietly; the subject, he conceived, had been exhausted, and his opinion had undergone no change. He regretted that these sentiments had not been felt elsewhere, and where he thought they ought to have been felt. As to the amendment, he thought a moment's delay should be allowed to examine it, and he moved its postponement until to-morrow.

Mr. BURRILL was in favor of a longer postponement, but hoped until to-morrow at least would be permitted. He, too, expressed his regret that the question had been reopened, and added a few remarks on the propriety of giving some time to consider this amendment, which was certainly of an important character.

Mr. MORRIL moved a postponement of the question to Monday, and spoke a few words in favor of that course.

Messrs. SMITH and BARBOUR opposed so long a postponement as to Monday, but were willing to allow until to-morrow.

The motion to postpone the subject to Monday was lost; and the resolution and amendment were postponed until to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 7.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in pursuance of the resolution of the Senate of the third of April last, directing that the Secretary of the Treasury "cause to be prepared and laid before the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a statement of the money expended in each year, since the Declaration of Independence, in holding conferences and making treaties with the Indian tribes; specifying grants and presents, whether in money or goods; annuities paid, and now payable to the Indian tribes; the money annually appropriated and paid for the Indian trade, including the sums allowed for salaries, and allowances to superintendents, clerks, factors, commissioners, agents, interpreters, and all other persons employed under the authority of the United States, in negotiations and intercourse with the Indian tribes;" and the report was read.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a report of the Secretary of War, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 19th of April last, "directing the Secretary of War to lay before the Senate, at the commencement of its next session, a statement of all annuities payable by the United States to Indians or Indian tribes, or under treaties with Indians; distinguishing the several annuities; the periods during which they are respectively payable; and exhibiting the capitals or present values of such annuities, computing annual interest at six per centum;" and the report was read.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Holmes, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of John Holmes; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

On motion, by Mr. WILSON, the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John B. Timberlake, were discharged from the further consideration thereof; and the petition was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ROBERTS submitted the following motion for consideration, which was twice read by unanimous consent:

Resolved, That Mountjoy Bayly, Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper of the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ a fit person for the purpose of attending the furnace constructed for warming the Senate Chamber, and the expense hereby incurred shall be defrayed out of the contingent fund.

Mr. HORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill entitled "An act to incorporate the managers of the National Vaccine Institution in the District of Columbia," reported it without amendment.

Mr. TRIMBLE obtained leave to bring in a bill to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out a canal in the State of Ohio; which was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the act entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," was read the second time.

The bill from the House of Representatives to provide for paying to the State of Illinois three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands in that State, was taken up; and, after being explained and supported by Messrs. THOMAS and EDWARDS, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

ADMISSION OF MISSOURI.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the resolution for the admission of Missouri into the Union; the question being on the following proviso, offered yesterday by Mr. EATON:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the assent of Congress to any provision in the constitution of Missouri, if any such there be, which contravenes that clause in the Constitution of the United States which declares that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.'"

Mr. KING, of New York, observed that the decision had been deferred yesterday at his request. For himself, he could discover no good effect which the proviso would produce. Such a declaration could not weaken the effect of the repugnant article of the constitution adopted by Missouri, or alter in any respect, he conceived, the question as it already stood before the Senate, concerning the admission of the new State. He therefore could not, viewing it as he did, assent to this proposition.

Mr. WILSON, of New Jersey, offered the following substitute, by way of amendment to the proposition of Mr. EATON, which, Mr. W. said, would answer better his view of the subject, being more specific and particular than the proviso already offered:

"That nothing herein contained shall be construed as giving the assent of Congress to so much of the constitution of the State of Missouri making it the duty of the Legislature of said State to pass a law 'to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in said State, under any pretext whatsoever,' as may be repugnant to that provision of the Constitution of the United States which prescribes that 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.'"

Mr. EATON said, his wish was that Congress should avoid giving an opinion at all on the doubtful clause, or any particular clause of the constitution of Missouri; and the amendment offered by Mr. WILSON differed from his own in this only, that it did designate a particular feature in the constitution which was declared unacknowledged. He did not think this course so eligible as the one suggested by his own motion, and therefore could not accept the amendment in lieu of his.

Mr. PINKNEY was opposed to the amendment offered by Mr. WILSON, because the clause which it pointed out was not before Congress in any manner whatever, and he would accompany the resolution of admission with no opinion on that clause, even should the Legislature of Missouri legislate to the utmost verge of the clause. The first amendment being general, he had no objection to it.

On the question to agree to Mr. WILSON'S amendment, the Senate divided, and there appeared nine only in the affirmative; so it was rejected, and the question recurred on the proviso offered by Mr. EATON.

Mr. SMITH viewed this amendment as inoffensive, and therefore had no strong objection to it; but as he saw nothing in the constitution of Missouri which was not republican and conformable to the Constitution of the United States, and of the correctness of which opinion he was convinced, without assuming any thing on the score of talents, he could satisfy any member of the Senate he could not vote for an amendment which implied a doubt of the constitutionality of that document.

The question was then taken on adopting Mr.

Admission of Missouri.

SENATE.

EATON's proviso, and was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dana, Eaton, Edwards, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lloyd, Parrott, Pinkney, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Van Dyke, Walker of Alabama, and Williams of Mississippi—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Dickerson, Elliot, Johnson of Kentucky, King of New York, Lanman, Lowrie, Mason, Mills, Morrill, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Pleasants, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Talbot, Tichenor, Walker of Georgia, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson—24.

The question being then stated on the resolution going to a third reading—

Mr. SMITH made a few remarks, to say that as it seemed to be the wish of the Senate to take the question without debate, he would not thwart that wish, although it might be expected of him, from his situation of chairman of the committee which reported the resolution, to enter into some defence of it against the objections which had been indicated. As a member of the Southern States he was ready to maintain the ground he had assumed, but would yield to the desire for a quiet decision unless called out by gentlemen on the opposite side.

Mr. BURRILL, of Rhode Island, addressed the Chair.

[Mr. B., in attempting to rise and address the President, found his surtout entangled by his chair, and was so long detained by the embarrassment, that the Secretary had begun to call the yeas and nays, and one gentleman had actually answered. Mr. B. apologized to the President for not rising sooner, by stating the embarrassment, when Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, jocularly observed across the House that the gentleman ought to regard it as an omen of defeat, and yield to it accordingly; to which Mr. B. replied, "I fear no omen in my country's cause."]

Mr. B. proceeded. No other gentleman, he said, seemed disposed to address the Senate in defence of the opinions which he entertained on this question, and as he was a member of the committee which reported the resolution, from which he dissented, it was in some measure incumbent on him to submit briefly the reasons which governed him, especially after the remarks of gentlemen on the other side. We conceive, said Mr. B., that it would be contrary to the Constitution of the United States to accept this constitution sent up by the people of Missouri. The people of Missouri did not assemble under their own authority to frame this constitution, but under the authority of Congress. After performing this duty in a way that they deemed proper, they had sent it here for acceptance, and it was the duty of Congress, Mr. B. conceived, to examine and pronounce upon the legality of the instrument presented. He stated that it had been the practice heretofore to admit the members from new States to their seats in both Houses, in various ways; but inquiry had generally been made into the constitutions adopted by new States, and Congress satisfied that they were conformable to the acts authorizing them to be formed. The States had been admitted into the Union, some in one way, some in another; the latest mode, Mr. B. thought, ought to be the one which should have most weight on the present occasion. The three States last formed had been admitted much in the same mode; their constitutions had been formed nearly in the same way, and on the same models; Louisiana only was an exception to the usual form of admission—in her case more form was observed, and obvious reasons made it necessary.

It appeared to him, Mr. B. continued, to be right and proper for Congress to examine the constitution now presented, and ascertain whether it was in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, and republican: in other words, whether it was conformable to the terms on which the people of that Territory were authorized by Congress to form a constitution and State government. Some gentlemen entertained a different opinion. New States, said Mr. B., are admitted into the Union by the consent of Congress—that consent was given to Missouri at the last session; by it she had many things to do. She had first to decide whether she would accept the terms offered to her; by it she was prohibited from interfering with the rights of navigating the Mississippi; she was confined to certain boundaries, which she could not change or exceed; she was restrained from any interference with the public lands. These things were all in the act; and Mr. B. asked if it would not be idle to insert conditions, if Congress possessed no right to ascertain and decide if they had been complied with by the people to whom they were offered? It was in the nature of a contract between the United States and the people of Missouri, and it was competent for Congress, and was its duty, to see if that contract had been faithfully observed. It was held by some gentlemen that, as soon as the convention of Missouri was dissolved, it became a State, and had a right to all the immunities and attributes of a State. But suppose, Mr. B. said, the people of Missouri had taken no notice of those conditions of the act which he had referred to, but had disregarded or contravened them, would gentlemen then say the constitution ought to be received? Mr. B. offered some other arguments to show that the consent of Congress was necessary to the admission of the State; otherwise it admitted the strange doctrine, that the State might come into the Union in spite of Congress. This consent, he contended, ought not to be given, unless all the conditions of the act had been complied with.

In general, Mr. B. said, this constitution was sufficiently republican; and in one respect, he might say, it was almost too much so; for it took no notice whatever of the act under which the convention assembled which formed it. Its language is, "We the people of Missouri, do mutually agree to form and establish a free and independent Republic." In Alabama, where every thing in the formation of their State government was conducted with much propriety, their convention set out by saying they assembled under the authority of an act of Congress. The constitution of Missouri is entirely silent on this point, although some of its language could not be understood without referring to the act of Congress authorizing a convention; they declare that they establish, ratify, and confirm, certain boundaries, but they nowhere recognise the authority which prescribed these boundaries to them. Mr. B. repeated, that he thought Congress ought not to vary from the former mode of declaring its assent to the admission of new States. They would have to admit other States hereafter, and a departure now from the practice of the Government in receiving the constitutions of new States, would form a precedent which might in future cases be deplored.

But proceeding to the question, whether this constitution was such an one as ought to be accepted, Mr. B. said his objection to it arose on the following clause, which he found in the 26th section of the 3d article: "That it shall be the duty of the General Assembly of the State, as soon as 'may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary (among other things) to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State, under any pretext whatsoever." This clause Mr. B. conceived to be entirely repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. It prohibits a very large class of persons from entering the State at all; it does not say what shall be done when they get there, but it peremptorily prohibits their entering it under any pretext whatsoever. Even if soldiers of the United States, people of this prescribed class cannot enter Missouri without violating the constitution of the State. It was well known, Mr. B. said, that we have colored soldiers and sailors, and good ones, too, but under no pretext, whether of duty or any other motive, can they enter Missouri. He did not suppose if people of this description, in the service of the country, should enter the State, it would be attempted by the State authorities to exclude them; but it was sufficient, he thought, to show the unconstitutionality of the clause.

Great difficulty seemed to arise in deciding the question, as to what constituted citizens in the different States. Citizens of one State were entitled to the rights of citizens of all the States; yet the different States exercised the power of prescribing certain probationary rules to those coming from another State, to entitle them to all the privileges. If a citizen of Massachusetts removes to another State, he cannot vote as soon as he enters it—a certain residence is required of him—and the people of Missouri were competent by law to impose a residence of one or more years on a citizen going there, to entitle him to all the privileges of citizens of the State; he complies with no more than is exacted of all, and which the State has a right to require. This was a question, however, which they did not touch; they avoided it altogether, and have declared that a certain class shall not come into their State at all, even though they may be citizens of other States, enjoying all the privileges of such.

Mr. B. did not himself conceive it difficult to define what constituted a citizen. If a person was not a slave or a foreigner—but born in the United States, and a free man—going into Missouri, he has the same rights as if born in Missouri; after complying with the conditions prescribed by the laws to qualify him for the exercise of these rights, he stands precisely on the same footing, and his rights are in every respect the same as if he had been born there. The question then was, Mr. B. said, had the people of Missouri the Constitutional right to prohibit from entering that State a large class of persons who were citizens of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts? To establish the negative of this proposition, Mr. B. adduced various other arguments in addition to the preceding, and endeavored to show that even many laws of the United States would become inoperative in Missouri, if the clause which he opposed could be maintained in force; and, as an instance, he referred to the laws against kidnapping. In regard to this crime of kidnapping, Mr. B. remarked, the constitution of Missouri had done nothing; for, according to it, all people of color who are carried there must, ipso facto, be slaves, inasmuch as a free negro could in no wise go there, admitting the clause to have its full effect.

Mr. B. said he was not prepared at present to affirm that Missouri might not pass laws to prohibit persons from carrying there negro or mulatto convicts, or perhaps foreigners from coming into the State; this was a question on which no opinion now was necessary; but he contended that the clause as it stood prohibited the entrance of a large portion of people who were, to all intents and purposes, citizens in other States. Admit the legality of this clause, and, Mr. B. said, the Legislature of Missouri might, with the same right, go still further, and pass laws to exclude citizens born in certain portions or districts of the United States. This was a measure, he argued, which one independent nation could not adopt towards another. England could not pass such a law against the people of France, or of any other friendly nation; such a measure would be too offensive to be borne, and would be considered to amount almost to a declaration of war. If distinct and independent nations dare not enact such laws towards each other, how was it possible, Mr. B. said, that the power could be exercised by one of these States towards other States of the Union?

All the distinctions among citizens which arise from color, rested, Mr. B. said, on State laws alone—there was nothing in the Constitution of the United States which recognised distinctions. In Massachusetts there was no distinction; a man of color possessed there precisely and identically the same rights as a white man born in the same State, and he asked if it was possible for Missouri, consistently with the Constitution of the United States, to exclude any of those people from that State, who should think proper to remove from Massachusetts to Missouri? The States of this Union were not distinct and independent nations—they are, said Mr. B., a confederacy of kindred republics; when they formed their constitution of government, they used the language, "we, the people of the United States," and it is not in the power of one of the members of this confederacy to enforce the clause Missouri has adopted, and it is the duty of Congress to reject it.

Mr. B. said he would add nothing more about the right of Congress to decide this question; he would merely say, Congress must from necessity decide it; it must admit the members of Missouri; in that act the question was involved, and they were obliged, therefore, to decide it. It was useless, therefore, to talk of referring the question to the judiciary. As Congress "might admit new States" into the Union, it was clear to his mind that Congress must determine the conditions on which they should come in.

Mr. B. said he would offer a few words as to the dangers which were apprehended by some gentlemen from a rejection of the constitution offered by Missouri. What were the consequences, Mr. B. asked, which would follow the rejection? The only one which he could perceive was, that Missouri must remain one year longer out of the Union. Was this such a hardship? And to avoid this trifling consequence, must we, said Mr. B., give a vote which will violate the Constitution we have sworn to support, and which we are all so deeply interested in maintaining? As a Territory the people of Missouri had gone on, he said, very prosperously, and no great inconvenience could result from continuing in the territorial condition one year longer. It is said they have formed a constitution, and under it have elected a Governor and Legislature, and, having assumed the functions and character of a State, if they are not now admitted into the Union, they will go on without our consent. Mr. B. said he presumed the people of Missouri felt the same attachment to the Union, and to the tranquillity, and honor, and glory of it as we do; and he would not believe, he would not do them the injustice to believe, that rather than endure the small inconvenience of retaining the territorial character a few months more, they would rashly throw away all the interest they had in the greatness and glory of their country. They might possibly still think that their constitution ought not to have been rejected on account of this offensive clause, and may feel some excitement on the occasion; yet they must see the necessity and propriety of some sacrifice to the conscientious opinion of Congress, and would consent to qualify their constitution in the objectionable feature. But, said Mr. B., if we ratify it as it is, we establish a precedent and admit a point that the judiciary will never be able to overthrow; do not then leave to another tribunal the decision of a question which belongs to us, but let us meet and decide it ourselves.

If the constitution were not accepted, Mr. B. said it would be easy to obviate any difficulty by passing an additional act authorizing the people of Missouri to form another convention and revise their constitution; and he was confident this odious feature would be expunged. These people, Mr. B. said, were not Missourians, properly so distinguished, but were Americans, collected there from all the States, the same people as ourselves. They would appreciate the motives of Congress, and do them justice; they would recollect, also, that this act passed in a spirit of compromise and accommodation, from a desire to preserve peace and quietness in every part of the Union; and re-assembling with such views, finding the clause could do no good, they would repeal it. Sanction this improper clause now, said he, and you sanction it for all time to come; and however we may desire hereafter to avoid it, it will be irrevocably established.

Mr. B. said, the little he had spoken had exhausted his strength, and he could add nothing more if he wished to do so.

When Mr. B. had concluded—

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, intimated an intention of replying to Mr. B.; but, as he would have to refer to several constitutions and other authorities, in the course of his argument, he asked a short time to prepare them, and moved the postponement of the subject until to-morrow; which motion prevailed, and it was postponed accordingly.

FRIDAY, December 8.

Mr. PLEASANTS presented the memorial of Charlotte I. Bullus, widow of John Bullus, deceased, late navy agent for the port of New York, praying that the accounting officer of the Navy Department may be directed to credit the account of the deceased at the rate of $2,000 per annum during the time he performed the extra duties of navy agent on the Lakes; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of the citizens of Charleston, South Carolina, protesting against any increase of the duties at present imposed on imported goods; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of Paul Beck, junior, and Thomas Sparks and others, of Philadelphia, manufacturers of, and dealers in, shot, praying that an additional duty may be laid on imported shot; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. HOLMES, of Mississippi, presented the petition of John M. Whitney and John Snodgrass, in behalf of the legal representatives of Alexander Montgomery, deceased, praying that a law may be passed directing a warrant to be issued to them for a quantity of land in Mississippi, as an indemnity for a like quantity of their land improperly disposed of by the Register and Receiver of the Land Office west of Pearl river; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. PINKNEY presented the petition of Rebecca Hodgson, widow of Joseph Hodgson, deceased, praying remuneration for the loss of the house burnt in the year 1800, whilst occupied by the Government as the War Office; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public

Lands, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis,'" reported the same without amendment; and, on motion by Mr. EATON, the Senate proceeded to consider the said bill, as in Committee of the Whole, and, no amendment having been proposed thereto, the President reported it to the House; and it passed to a third reading.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Morgan Brown, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Morgan Brown; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

The bill for the relief of John Holmes was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Illinois three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same," was read the third time, and passed.

ADMISSION OF MISSOURI.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, addressed the Senate, as follows:

He observed that, on any subject, however interesting it might be, he could not flatter himself with a hope that he could entertain the Senate. But, what he had to offer at present, on this very important occasion, would consist very much of references, and he feared might prove tedious; therefore he felt more necessity than on most occasions to ask for a little patience and their kind indulgence.

The resolution declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union, he thought, was nothing more than a matter of form, and might be dispensed with. He had examined the journals of the Senate and House of Representatives for the course heretofore pursued by Congress on the admission of new States into the Union, and found it had been various. He would give their history.

Vermont was the first new State admitted after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. On the 9th of February, 1791, President WASHINGTON laid before Congress documents received from the Governor of Vermont, expressing the consent of the Legislature of New York, and of the Territory of Vermont, that the said territory shall be admitted to be a distinct member of our Union. (1) On the 18th of the same month, (2) an act of Congress was approved for the admission of Vermont into the Union, without any of this formality, that her constitution should be republican, &c. The act says, "Vermont, having petitioned Congress, &c., on the 4th day of March, &c., shall be received and admitted into this Union, as a new and entire member of the United States of America." (1) On the 31st of October following, Mr. Robinson took his seat in the Senate, (2) and on the 4th of November Mr. Bradley took his seat. There was no constitution either submitted to, or required by, Congress. Nor were there any traces of a constitution of that new State to be found previous to the 9th of July, 1793. Congress never supposed at that day they had a power to require a constitution from a new State coming into the Union, nor to examine if such constitution was republican. Mr. S. said he knew very well that the people of that respectable State contend it was one of the original States. We know of none but thirteen original States. Vermont would have made fourteen; and it was treated of, and so called at the time, as a territory. It was detached from New York, and, by the express consent of the Legislature of New York, she was received into the Union.

Kentucky was the next new State admitted into the Union. (3) On the 18th of December, 1789, and after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the Legislature of Virginia passed the act authorizing Kentucky to form a separate State. (4) On the 4th of February, 1791, Congress passed an act of consent that Kentucky should become a separate State, and be admitted into the Union on the first day of June, 1792. On the 19th of April, 1792, its constitution was formed, but was never submitted to Congress. (5) On the 5th of November, 1792, Messrs. Brown and Edwards, as Senators from that State, took their seats in the Senate, without even an inquiry for a constitution.

Tennessee formed her constitution on the 6th of February, 1796. This was the first constitution of a new State submitted to Congress. There does not appear to have been any reference made of this constitution to any committee, or any other order taken upon it. There is to be found in the debates of the 5th and 6th of May, 1796, an objection made to one provision of that constitution, inasmuch as it was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. This objection was made by a member from South Carolina, and was replied to by Mr. Baldwin of Georgia, "that, if repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, it was a nullity, because the Constitution of the United States was paramount." And this appears to have put an end to the objection.

Ohio was the next new State adopted into the Union. (6) On the 30th of April, 1802, the law passed authorizing Ohio to form a constitution and State government. On the 29th of November, 1802, she formed her constitution. (7) On the 7th January, 1803, it was laid before the Senate, and was referred to a committee, which never reported on it. (1) On the 19th of February, 1803, Congress passed a law "to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio." In this last law it is declared that, by the law of 30th April, 1802, authorizing the people of the Territory of Ohio to form a constitution and State government, Ohio had become one of the United States of America. This law says nothing about her being admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; but simply says, "whereby the said State has become one of the United States of America."

Louisiana was authorized, by an act of Congress of the 20th of February, 1811, to form a constitution and State government, and formed her constitution on the 28th January, 1812. (2) On the 8th of April, 1812, was admitted into the Union by a law. This was the first State admitted with formality. The new mode of declaring this State to be admitted, by law, seems to have been dictated from motives of interest. Louisiana had within her limits the Mississippi and other valuable navigable rivers. By that law, which admits her into the Union, the free navigation of all those rivers is secured forever to all the old States, free from "any tax, duty, impost, or toll;" whilst the old States retain the right to these exactions, and some of them do actually exact it. The State of New York now exacts, as a toll, one dollar upon every passenger in the steamboats that go up the North river, and derives from that source an immense revenue, laying the whole United States under contribution; whilst her own citizens are navigating the Mississippi and its waters, under the act of Congress, without being subjected to any such duty. And this is what they have been pleased to call admitting her "into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatsoever."

Indiana was admitted into the Union by a joint resolution of both Houses of Congress, on the 11th of December 1816; but its history proves beyond a doubt that it was considered a State, to all intents and purposes, before the resolution passed. An act in the usual form had passed for its admission; and it had, by a convention, formed a constitution on the 20th of June, 1816. Congress assembled on the 2d of December, 1816; on that day the House of Representatives admitted Mr. Hendricks, the member elect, to take the oath of office, and take his seat in the House. On the 4th, the resolution originated in the Senate; on the 6th it passed; was sent to the House on the 9th, and passed that day—eight days after the member had been admitted to his seat; nor had the House of Representatives ever taken up the subject at all. On the 11th, the resolution was approved. Here, it is evident there was a great falling off in vigilance; but, it is to be remarked, we were going north about. Louisiana could not be admitted by any thing less solemn than a law. Indiana did not require a resolution, for the House of Representatives at least. On the 12th of February, 1817, the Presidential votes were counted in the Representatives' Chamber, whither the Senate, in a body, had gone for that purpose. All the votes of the several States were counted, except the votes of Indiana. Here Mr. S. said, he would read from the Journals of the House of Representatives, what passed on that occasion, as there were several gentlemen of the Senate who had taken their seats since. (1)

Mr. S. said, in consequence of this proceeding, the Senators had a very solemn procession down the stairs and up again, and there it ended; for they unanimously concurred in considering it so frivolous that they forbid it a place on the Journals. The Electors of President and Vice President were elected by the State of Indiana, and the electoral votes given before the resolution was offered for its admission into the Union. This act was solemnly sanctioned by both Houses of Congress. It was the highest act which a State, in its political capacity, can perform. Who, then, can doubt for a moment that Indiana was a State, as perfect as it is possible for this Government to make? If Indiana was so, why should not Missouri be so, under the same circumstances? It cannot be doubted. She is a State, and you cannot disfranchise her. But, it is said she cannot be admitted into the Union, because her constitution is repugnant to the Constitution of the United

"When the President of the Senate was about to open the votes of that State, for the purpose of having the same counted,

"Mr. Taylor, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, rose, and objected to the same, and stated that, in his opinion, the votes of the Electors of Indiana, for President and Vice President, ought not to be received.

"Upon which objection being made, the Senate, on motion of one of its members, withdrew; and, being absent, a resolution was then submitted by Mr. Sharp, in the following words:

"Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c., That the votes of the Electors for the State of Indiana for President and Vice President of the United States, were properly and legally given, and ought to be counted.

"A motion was made by Mr. Taylor, of New York, to amend the said resolution, by striking out all thereof after the enacting clause, and inserting the following: 'That the votes of the Electors of the State of Indiana, for President and Vice President of the United States, having been given previous to the admission of that State into the Union, ought not to be received and counted.' And debate arising thereon, a motion was made by Mr. Ingham, that the resolution be postponed indefinitely. And the question being taken thereon, it passed in the affirmative.

"The Senate again attended, &c. And the President of the Senate, in the presence of both Houses, proceeded to open the certificates of the Electors of the State of Indiana, which he delivered to the tellers, by whom it was read, and who took lists of the votes therein enclosed."

States, and is not republican; and that Congress, by the Federal Constitution, is to guaranty to every State a republican form of Government; therefore, it is the province of Congress to examine for this quality in the constitution of any State which applies for admission into the Union.

If, sir, Congress has to decide upon the republican form of government of the new States, it has also to decide upon it for all the old States. The language of the Constitution is, "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." This applied immediately to the old States; and, if it is the duty of Congress, why did not Congress examine all the constitutions of the several States? Why not require each State, when it alters or new-models its constitution, to submit it to that tribunal to decide whether it is republican? Nine of the States have altered their constitutions since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. New Hampshire, in February, 1792; Connecticut, in September, 1818; Vermont, in July, 1793, or rather formed one; Pennsylvania, in September, 1792; Delaware, in June, 1792; Maryland, at sundry times; South Carolina, in June, 1790; Georgia, in May, 1798; and Kentucky, in August, 1799. None of these States have ever submitted their renewed constitutions to Congress for its approbation. It is the duty of Congress, under the term "guaranty," to look into any constitution. Who will be bold enough to say it is not its duty to see that no State shall alter its constitution, but by its permission and authority? It would be to little purpose to say the United States shall guaranty the republican form of government, unless its control can be continued. Every State has the power to revise its constitution whenever it shall think proper. And, if you look at the constitution of Missouri to-day, and pass it as republican, and that State should alter it to-morrow, and destroy its republican features, and defy your control, this power has been given to very little purpose, and had much better been withheld.

Mr. S. said, upon looking into the constitution of the thirteen original States, he had discovered that Rhode Island had no constitution; nor had she ever any. She has what the good people of that State call the "charter of Rhode Island," granted by King Charles the Second; in which he has made certain reservations, as an acknowledgment of his sovereignty. And throughout the whole instrument, the people are treated of, and called subjects. They can have no claim to a republican form of government under such a charter.

Why, then, does not Congress issue its writ of quo warranto to the Governor or the Legislature of Rhode Island, calling on them to show by what authority they claim to be one of the United States? Or to show cause, if any they can, why that State should not be disfranchised for holding her government under a foreign Prince? Or else issue some process to compel her to form such a constitution as shall guaranty to her a republican form of government? Congress has as much power to do this as it has to reject the constitution of Missouri.

If Congress has the power to guaranty the republican form of government, and it can only be exercised when a State presents itself for admission into the Union, there ought to be an uniformity in its course. The same State of Rhode Island refused to adopt the Federal Constitution for some time after the organization of this Government. Then Rhode Island stood precisely on the ground on which Missouri now is said to stand. Missouri is a State, but it is said is not in the Union; Rhode Island was a State, and acknowledged on all hands to be out of the Union at that time. Why did not Congress exercise this salutary control when Rhode Island came into the Union; and abrogate her English charter, and give her a constitution, with at least some semblance of a republican form of government in it, and blot out the odious words, sovereign and subject, monarchical vestiges which still characterize it? It is evident, to a demonstration, that Congress is not the tribunal to decide this Constitutional question. It must be left to the judicial department, whose province alone it is to judge the private rights of individuals. There are no governmental rights to be involved, but the rights of persons only, if any; and shall Congress erect itself into a tribunal to investigate whether by chance some free negro or mulatto, fifty years hence, might suffer, and put this whole Union in jeopardy? He viewed such a crisis with awe. Mr. S. said he would be amongst the last to invoke it, but we could not shut our eyes upon what was going on in the northern section of this Union. At the time they were fulminating their threats to dissolve the Union, if Missouri should be admitted into it, they were declaring to the world that the Southern States were endeavoring to intimidate, but would not dare to disturb the Confederacy. One printer, of Philadelphia, tired of waiting for some post of honor or profit under the old government, has divided the Union on paper, and laid out a snug government for himself and his friends, under which, perchance, he may be better provided for. Another fellow has called himself Patrick Henry, and writes as if it belonged to him to dissolve this empire, if he should so will it. He intends to bring about in this country a succession of Patrick Henrys, in imitation of the Cæsars of the Roman world; and he is to be Patrick Henry the second. This Patrick Henry the second has declared if Missouri with her constitution is received, it is of itself a dissolution of the Union. If ever this Union is disturbed, it will be by such monsters as these. It is not here that revolution is to commence; it is to begin with the people, by means of misrepresentations. By imposing on their honesty. Let those who are fanning this flame beware of the consequences. If the torrent begins to roll, there is no telling where it is to stop.

We are told this constitution is not republican; therefore it cannot be sanctioned, because it is the duty of the Government to guaranty to every State of this Union a republican form of government. The evidence of this, it is said, is manifested in the third and fourth clauses of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution of Missouri, which authorizes the Legislature to pass laws "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State under any pretext whatsoever."

The Convention, which formed our Federal Constitution, has not been as explicit as we could wish in defining what a republican form of government is. But we have always understood that sort of government which is administered by the people to be a republican form of government, and does not obtain nor lose this form when the free negroes and mulattoes are excluded from a participation. This is a case sui generis. The history of the ancient world furnishes no precedent. The Grecian Republics abounded in slaves; but they had no share in the political concerns of the nation. Sparta was said to approach nearer to a pure democracy than any other Government that ever existed. Yet they had slaves in thousands and hundreds of thousands, who had no share in political affairs. They were white, and what of them were not sold to foreign nations, or butchered by their masters, who had the absolute control over their persons and lives, without account, were finally suffered to mingle with the free men, and became one people. But the difference of color forbids that course with us, and will operate as a perpetual barrier, until time shall overcome it. Although they are not slaves themselves, who were prohibited by this constitution to settle in Missouri; yet they are the late offspring of slaves, and have been placed and considered in the body politic upon the same footing and no other. Their parents were slaves during the Revolutionary war. They were in a state of slavery from Boston to the St. Mary's, laboring in your fields. It was not then slaveholding States and non-slaveholding States, but all were slaveholding States. It is true since that time the Northern States, finding it their interest to do so, have sold the greater part of them to the Southern people, and have freed the rest. These freed negroes and mulattoes are now, for the first time, called citizens of the United States; and are, it is said, by the Constitution of the United States, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States.

As no example is to be found in the history of any other nation, and this being the first time which this question has occurred in our own Government, whether free negroes and mulattoes are, as such, citizens, must be ascertained by such evidences as, from the nature of things, we are compelled to give the highest credence to. Mr. S. said this was to be found in the Constitution and laws of the United States, and in the constitutions or laws of the several States. They furnish a mass of evidence, which nobody could doubt but a sceptic, that free negroes and mulattoes have never been considered as a part of the body politic; neither by the General Government nor the several State governments. All their laws, and all their constitutions, contain marked distinctions by which this class of people are excluded from all participation in your political institutions; not in the Southern States, but in the Eastern States, the Northern States, and the Western States. Almost all the States in the Union have excluded them from voting in elections. There is no State that admits them into the militia. Very few States admit them to give evidence. No State had passed any law constituting them citizens. Mr. S. said he would not inquire in what department the power existed, if it existed anywhere, whether in the State governments or in the General Government, to naturalize them; but at present neither the one nor the other had done so; and, until some supreme power should do so, they could not claim "the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." He would now ask the Senate for their further indulgence, till he could examine this subject more minutely, from the written documents themselves, which he would beg leave to read severally. In doing so, he would begin with the Declaration of Independence itself. This sacred instrument says: "We hold these truths 'to be self-evident: that all men are created 'equal; that they are endowed by their Creator 'with certain inalienable rights; that among 'these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.'"

If this was a declaration of independence for the blacks as well as the whites, why did you not all emancipate your slaves at once, and let them join you in the war. But we know this was not done. We know that slavery was as much cherished in Massachusetts, and the other New England States, as it was anywhere else in the Union. In fine, there was an universal consent, at that day, that these people were slaves, and were our personal property, and had no share in the body politic. No gentleman will now be bold enough to say otherwise. New York is yet seeking for remuneration from the British Government for their slaves, by that name, which were plundered from that State during the Revolutionary war. The very Constitution under which we are now assembled, which was formed for the better cementing the Government, derived from that Declaration of Independence, has not only sanctioned the slavery which then existed in the United States, but, by the ninth section of the first article, expressly permitted the whole of the States, twelve years after this Declaration of Independence, to open their ports to the African slave trade for a succession of twenty years. But it is said these free negroes and mulattoes are citizens. The most of them were born slaves, and the act of manumission by the masters could not constitute them citizens. If the master can make a citizen, it must be by some other process than his sign manual on paper. By the act of Congress, passed on the 14th of April, 1802, to establish an uniform rule of naturalization, the Congress itself has guarded against naturalizing any but white population. The first clause of the act is these words: * "That any alien, being a free white person, may be admitted to 'become a citizen of the United States, or any of 'them, on the following conditions,' &c. The Government of Hayti was then an independent Empire; and why were they excluded this privilege, if all men were created equal?

Mr. SMITH said he would now examine the constitutions of those States which had been admitted into the Union since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The most of which had passed under the eye of Congress, and had their solemn sanction; and would show how assiduously they had kept up the distinction between the white and black population, and how carefully the colored people were excluded from all share in the affairs of the body politic in the State governments.

In the eighth section of the second article of the constitution of Kentucky, are these words: "In all elections for Representatives, every free male citizen, (negroes, mulattoes, and Indians, excepted,) &c., shall enjoy the right of an elector."

In the first section of the seventh article of that constitution it is said: "The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of their owners, or without paying their owners a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated."

In the first section of the fourth article of the constitution of Ohio, it is said: "In all elections, all white male inhabitants, &c., shall enjoy the right of an elector."

In the constitution of Louisiana, it is said: "No person shall be a Representative who, at the time of his election, is not a free white male citizen of the United States."

This constitution was submitted to Congress, and was examined with more than ordinary vigilance. So much so, that the State could not gain admittance into the Union without passing a very special and a very rigid law; in which Louisiana was laid under injunctions imposed on no other State, before or since. Yet, with all this vigilance, she is suffered to exclude from the right of representing the State, all colored people. If there are black and yellow citizens, how could Congress permit that constitution to exclude from so valuable a privilege men who, perhaps, had all the requisites of a representative except that of color? Who can estimate the difference between being denied a residence in a State, or denied the valuable privilege of being a representative, or even the right of being represented.

In the 1st section of the 3d article of the constitution of the State of Mississippi, you find the same in substance. The words are, "Every free white male person, &c., shall be deemed a qualified elector."

In the 1st section of the 2d division, of the 6th article of the same constitution, are the words: "The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of their owners." Mr. S. observed, that he read this last part of that constitution because it was nearly in the same words as the 26th section of the 3d article of the constitution of Missouri, to which he had heard great objections because it prevented the desirable work of emancipation. When the constitution of Mississippi was before the Senate, only three years ago, there was not a dissenting voice, nor a murmur in the community.

In the constitution of Indiana, which passed the scrutiny of the Senate only four years ago, in the 1st section of the 1st article, it is said, "That all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and inalienable rights; among which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

How very incompatible would these two clauses of that constitution appear, if it were not for that universal assent which prevails throughout the Union, that free negroes and mulattoes are not known in your political institutions. This is a more marked distinction than any of the preceding. They, for the most part, say, "free white male," &c., but this is simply a distinction between white and black, with the utter exclusion of the colored man. What citizen of the United States would prefer this degrading distinction to exile? The people of Indiana had been eulogized by a gentleman of the Senate, (Mr. KING, of New York,) on this very question, at the last session of Congress, and, Mr. S. said he believed, very deservedly, as a wise and prudent people. These people could have had no prejudices from habitual slavery. They had been nursed in the lap of freedom. When that territory was ceded by Virginia to the United States, there was a stipulation to exclude slavery; notwithstanding which, their men of color are excluded from any portion of political rights. As a further evidence of the degraded condition of free negroes and mulattoes, in Indiana, below that of a citizen, he would beg leave to read a law of that State, passed about two years after it was elevated from its territorial government. He read as follows: "No negro, mulatto, or Indian, shall be a witness, except in pleas of the State against negroes, mulattoes, or Indians, or in civil cases where negroes, mulattoes, or Indians, alone, shall be parties." They have, by another clause of the same law, graduated the mulatto. It says, "Every person other than a negro, of whose grandfathers or grandmothers any one is, or shall have been a negro, although all his other progenitors, except that descending from a negro, shall have been white persons, shall be deemed a mulatto, and so every person who shall have one-fourth part or more of negro blood, shall in like manner be deemed a mulatto." Can any possible doubt exist that the people of Indiana consider that free negroes and mulattoes are not citizens?

Mr. S. said he would now beg leave to advert to some laws of Congress, of recent dates, which would show, as strongly as can be shown, that Congress has not only believed them to be degraded below the level of citizens, but have actually placed them there, by their laws. Congress required all territorial laws to come under its revision, and particularly so the laws of the Territory of Orleans, before it became the State of Louisiana. By one of the territorial laws of Orleans, of the 7th of June, 1806, it is enacted, (1) "That free people of color ought never to insult or strike white people, nor presume to conceive themselves equal to the white; but, on the contrary, that they ought to yield to them on every occasion, and never speak or answer to them but with respect, under the penalty of imprisonment, according to the nature of the offence." This is a law which passed under the immediate inspection of Congress.

He would now turn to the act of Congress, of last session, which passed on the 15th of May, 1820, and not long after the heated debate upon the bill for admitting Missouri into the Union, when the minds of all the members were filled with this subject, for incorporating the inhabitants of the City of Washington, &c., by which they were continued to be a body politic and corporate. In this act is to be found these words: (2) "Any person shall be eligible to the office of Mayor who is a free white male citizen of the United States." In another part of the same act it says, "That no person shall be eligible to a seat in the Board of Aldermen, or Board of Common Council, unless he shall be more than twenty-five years of age, a free white male citizen of the United States, &c." In another part of that act, in enumerating the powers of the corporation, it is said it shall have full power and authority "to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which free negroes and mulattoes may reside in the city."

Mr. SMITH observed, that, when this law was before the Senate, it was thoroughly investigated by an honorable gentleman from the East, (Mr. BURRILL.) Seeing it in such hands, he paid but little attention to it himself; but he found, upon examining it, free negroes and mulattoes were not only excluded from all share in the offices, but were placed under the inspection of the corporation, to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which they may reside in the city. Giving power to prescribe the terms, is, in effect, giving power to expel. This is an unanswerable proof of the degraded condition in which Congress consider free negroes and mulattoes ought to be placed. With this strong and peculiar example before their eyes, well might the people of Missouri conceive they had a right to provide against this evil. The example is peculiar, because Congress have sat here for the last twenty years; during which time, he had understood, a swarm of mulattoes had been reared in the city; many of whom, no doubt, had as illustrious fathers as any in the nation. These mulattoes have been under the parental care of Congress, until some of them have nearly arrived to the years of maturity; and, if their education has been equal to their parentage, might, in a few years, fill the mayoralty with great dignity. Instead of which, they are now to be placed at the disposal of a petty corporation. All their hopes are blasted, and themselves drove to seek their fortunes in the wilds of Missouri, on account of their color. And shall a mulatto to whom Congress will deny a residence in the City of Washington, unless he is specially licensed by the corporation, be considered, by that same Congress, if he will only emigrate to the State of Missouri, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of the most distinguished citizens of the United States?

He supposed gentlemen who contended for the rights of these sable brethren in Missouri, and who had denied them a residence at Washington, could have no objection to see one of them returned as a member of this honorable body. And if they are entitled to all privileges and immunities of the citizens of the several States, wheresoever they would go, it would be infringing much upon the republican principle to refuse them this honor. Had Christophe, the famous chief of Hayti, came to some sections of our country, before he blew his own brains out, if he could have obtained the naturalization which our free negroes and mulattoes have done, by a residence merely, he might, under the spirit of these times, soon have found his way here. He had seen in this morning's paper some high encomiums on his rival and successor Boyer, his present Majesty of Hayti, by a correspondent of his, in the State of Connecticut, who seems to invite an alliance with his Excellency. This correspondent thinks it would be very useful to this country.

In the very law which authorized Missouri to elect the convention which formed the constitution now before you, is the following provision, (1) "that all free white male citizens of the United States, &c., shall be qualified to be elected, and they are hereby qualified and authorized to vote and choose representatives to form a convention." We find nothing in that law for the free negroes and mulattoes. Mr. S. said he had not been able to obtain the statute laws of Ohio and Illinois, but was informed that both those States had laws imposing penalties upon, and degrading free negroes and mulattoes. So far he had confined his observations and references to the Declaration of Independence, the Constitution and laws of the United States, and to the constitutions and laws of such of the separate States as had been formed, under the authority, and since the adoption, of the Federal Constitution. He had done so for the purpose of showing the uniformity of sentiment and of action, which had so invariably prevailed, on every political occasion, to give a decisive character to the degraded condition of free negroes and mulattoes. He had, as yet, offered no evidence derived from the laws and constitutions of the original States. He would now do so, and see how far they maintained the arguments of the gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. BURRILL) that the constitution of Missouri is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and wants the republican form, which it is the duty of Congress to guaranty; because it provides for prohibiting free negroes and mulattoes from going to, and settling in that State. We were taught to believe that no State in the Union, besides Missouri, had had the boldness to restrain the ingress or egress of any citizen; or that any distinction had been made between the white citizens and the yellow and black citizens. He would endeavor to show the gentleman's arguments were incorrect. In this examination he would pass by all those States which held slaves. It was known, and would be admitted, that each of them had, either in their laws or constitution, deprived free negroes and mulattoes of all the political rights of citizens; such as denying them the right to vote at elections; or depriving them of the liberty to give evidence against a white person; forbidding them to bear arms; and several of these States have compelled them to depart, and forbidden them to return. For this we have been often reproached. To proceed with the course he had laid out to himself, he would begin with New Hampshire.

New Hampshire had said in her constitution "that all men are born equally free and independent. Have certain natural, essential, and inherent rights—among which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty," &c.

In the year 1808 she passed a law to regulate her militia, in which it is, amongst other things, enacted "that each and every free able-bodied white male citizen of this State, resident therein, who is, or shall be of the age of sixteen years, and under the age of forty, &c., shall be enrolled."

If the white man and the black man are born equally free and independent, and have the same natural rights, &c., among which are the enjoying and defending his life and liberty, how is the colored man to defend his life if he is prevented from the means given to the white man? This absurdity is so palpable that no man will attempt to reconcile it. No other conclusion can result, but that New Hampshire too, has yielded her assent, that free negroes and mulattoes are not citizens; but that these governments are constituted of white citizens only. A man deprived of his arms, or deprived of the means of using them as his fellow-citizens do, is deprived at least of half his defence. Republican New Hampshire would never do that.

He would next examine the laws and constitution of Vermont. Although this was one of the new States, on account of her local situation and political habits, he had classed her with the States in her neighborhood.

Vermont, also, had said, in the first article of her constitution, "that all men are born equally free and independent, and have certain natural, inherent, and inalienable rights, amongst which are the enjoying and defending life and liberty, acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety."

She passed a law on the 10th of March, 1797, to regulate the militia. In which it is also enacted, (1) "that every free able-bodied white male citizen above the age of eighteen, and under forty-five, &c., shall be enrolled," &c.

The defending life and protecting property, by the appointment of Heaven, must depend upon our physical powers. And will the State of Vermont, which knows so well the benefit of arms, strip, by law, a portion of her citizens of this essential means of defending life and protecting property? This, like the case of New Hampshire, proves that they have free negroes and mulattoes in Vermont, but have no black or yellow fellow-citizens there.

Vermont, as far as the decision of one State could go, had decided the political right which each State possesses, of expelling, by law, the citizens of any other State, if any should be rash enough to attempt to go there to reside. The 19th article of her constitution, which was ratified on the 9th of July, 1793, is in the following words: "That all people have a natural and inherent right to emigrate from one State to another that will receive them."

In pursuance of this authority, in their own constitution, Vermont, on the 6th November, 1801, passed a law to exclude, not only free negroes and mulattoes, but the citizens of every description, male and female, of the other States. It says, (1) "The selectmen shall have power to remove from the State any persons who come there to reside. And any person removed, and returning without permission of the selectmen, shall be whipped not exceeding ten stripes."

He could not conceive how Vermont could possibly say, that the constitution of Missouri was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, because it forbids a residence to free negroes and mulattoes, when its own laws and constitution forbid a residence to the most respectable citizens of all the other States. Unless they considered the whipping to be a saving clause, which might distinguish it from the Missouri case. However desirable a country Vermont may be, Mr. S. said, he believed there would be but few, either black or white, who would become citizens, until there should be some other mode of naturalizing than at the whipping post.

Mr. S. said, the more he examined the subject the better he was satisfied that the great and respectable State of Pennsylvania, however mistaken he might think her policy, for indiscriminate emancipation, had had more benevolent views than any other State in the Union. They had examined it more than any other, and knew the rights of free negroes and mulattoes better, and defended them with more zeal. For the purpose of showing what was the opinion entertained in her Legislature, at its last session, of the right of States to prohibit the migration of free negroes and mulattoes, he would read from the journals of that body, which he then held, a resolution, offered by two of its well-informed and respectable members.

(2) "A motion was made by Mr. Kerlin and Mr. G. Robinson, and read as follows, viz:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary system be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the migration or importation of free negroes and mulattoes into this Commonwealth."

This resolution was not acted on, but it shows the opinion of Pennsylvania, itself, upon the right which Missouri claims. And this resolution, it is observed, was presented on or about the 20th of January, 1820, at the very moment that Legislature passed an unanimous resolution for instructing their Senators, in Congress, to oppose the admission of Missouri into the Union, unless under the restriction of prohibiting slavery, when their minds were alive to the subject.

He said he would now examine the laws of Rhode Island, for she had no constitution, upon the subject of negroes and mulattoes generally. By one of their statute laws it is said, (1) "The town council shall, if any free negro or mulatto shall keep a disorderly house, or entertain any person or persons at unseasonable hours, break up his house and bind him out to service for two years."

If all were citizens, why not bind out a white brother citizen as well as a black or yellow one? The nature of the offence was certainly the same, and, it is reasonable to conclude, ought to be punished in the same way. By another clause of the same statute, it is enacted,

(2) "That no white person, Indian, or mulatto, or negro, keeping house in any town, shall entertain any Indian, mulatto, or negro servant or slave; if he does, to be punished by fine," &c.

Another clause of the same statute says, in treating of Indian, negro, and mulatto, servants or slaves:

(3) "That none should be absent at night, after nine o'clock. If found out, to be taken up and committed to jail till morning, and then appear before a justice of the peace, who is ordered and directed to cause such servant or slave to be publicly whipped, by the constable, ten stripes."

In the same statute book is a law of a more rigid character. It is in these words:

(4) "That whosoever is suspected of trading with a servant or slave, and shall refuse to purge himself by oath, shall be adjudged guilty, and sentence shall be given against him."

Our Northern friends had taken great liberties with the Southern people concerning the rigid manner of treating their slaves. But this is a refinement upon any thing of that sort to be found in the statute books of the Southern States. You can find no law for selling or binding out a free negro or mulatto, for entertaining his friends at what the town council might think an unseasonable hour. But to judge a man guilty and sentence him, if you suspect him, unless he will purge himself upon oath, is a stretch of political power, not known in any of the United States but Rhode Island. It was a species of despotism. This, however, must be added to the catalogue of evidence, which irresistibly shows that Rhode Island, as well as the other States, never intended to put free negroes and mulattoes upon the footing of citizens. Otherwise the laws would not sell the man of color for what the white man may commit without notice. Mr. S. said, this discussion would be useful in one respect, if injurious in another. We should understand the laws and constitutions of our neighboring States. Until this question was agitated he had been led to believe that slaves, as well as free negroes and mulattoes, in the Northern States, were as unrestrained as their masters. He now had the consolation to know that the laws of South Carolina, at least, were more mild on this subject than the laws of Rhode Island. Gentlemen might say these laws were repealed for aught he knew; if they were he knew nothing about it. He had not yet heard they were repealed; he had found their statute books, which contain these laws, in the law library attached to the Senate Chamber. He supposed some of them may be growing obsolete since they sold the greater part of their slaves to the people of the Southern States.

He would now examine the evidence the respectable State of Massachusetts would afford us in illustrating this subject; and would first advert to her constitution. In the first section of the first article are to be found the following words:

"All men are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential, and inalienable rights; among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; in fine, that of seeking their safety and happiness."

This declaration of rights comprehends all that a citizen could ask for, but no more than he is entitled to. And it gives to every citizen the same rights. Who will deny the right of every man, according to this constitution, to remain within the State, if he is a citizen, as long as he pleases? Who will say that marriage, to whomsoever the citizen shall think proper, if each party is agreed, is not a right of the highest importance? To grant this right to one citizen, and take it from another, would be giving to one and taking from the other the means of his happiness, which the constitution secures to him so emphatically. By a law of Massachusetts, passed the 6th of March, 1788, and which appears to have been revised in 1798, and again in 1802, it is expressly enacted—

"That no person, being an African or negro, other than a subject of the Emperor of Morocco, or a citizen of the United States, to be evidenced by a certificate, &c., shall tarry within this Commonwealth for a longer time than two months; if he does, the justices have power to order such person to depart, &c.; and if such person shall not depart within ten days, &c., such person shall be committed to the prison or house of correction. And for this offence, &c., he shall be whipped, &c., and ordered again to depart in ten days; and if he does not, the same process and punishment to be inflicted, and so totius quoties."

This totius quoties, we all understand to mean that he shall be whipped as often as he returns. Many, or at least some of the States, have passed laws to regulate the solemnization of marriage, which they have a right to do. Massachusetts, on the 15th of June, 1795, passed a law for the orderly solemnization of marriages, &c., from which the following is an extract:

(1) Laws of Rhode Island, pages 611, 612.

(2) Laws of Rhode Island, page 614.

(3) Laws of Rhode Island, page 614.

(4) Laws of Rhode Island, page 615.

(1) "That no person by this act authorized to marry, shall join in marriage any white person with any negro, Indian, or mulatto, on penalty of the sum of fifty pounds, two-third parts thereof to the use of the county wherein such offence shall be committed, and the residue to the prosecutor, to be recovered by the treasurer of the county, &c., and the said marriage shall be null and void," &c.

Massachusetts emancipated her slaves, what she had not sold off, at a pretty early period after the Revolutionary war. Those alluded to must be free negroes and mulattoes. Massachusetts we all know to be a Republican State, and to have a Republican form of government. She had been called the cradle in which the Revolution had been rocked. Her early achievements in that Revolution had been conspicuous. The battles of Bunker Hill and Concord would be spoken of by posterity with delight. She had been famed for her men of eloquence, and he had the pleasure to say, without flattery or irony, that he believed justly. She had the most numerous legislative body of any State in the Union—her number of representatives was about six hundred. Amidst such a multitude of council, is it possible for one member to believe, for a moment, that such a law could have passed, to prohibit a citizen to marry whomsoever he could gain the affections of? Or is there a man in Massachusetts who will say that marriage is not an essential happiness? If it is not secured to every citizen, where is their declaration of rights? We must look for the reason of this law, as in all the other States, in the universal assent to the degraded condition of that class of people, and from which none of the States would, perhaps, ever think it expedient to raise them. From the ranting of some enthusiasts, and the jeerings of some politicians, Mr. S. said, he had been led to believe there were no mulattoes in the New England States. But looking into their statute books, he found they were numerous; so much so, as to become the subjects of legislative control, and that a long time ago. It appears they were breeding them as far back as 1788, and he did not know how much earlier, but he supposed as long ago as when they began to import the Africans into Portsmouth, in the State of New Hampshire.

As the laws and constitution of Connecticut would give some aid in illustrating this question, he would refer to them.

In the first section of the first article of that constitution are the following words:

"That all men, when they form a social compact, are equal in rights."

In the second section of the sixth article of that constitution it is said: "Every white male citizen of the United States, &c., shall be an elector."

This constitution was formed on the 15th of September, 1818. The good people of that State called the convention which formed that constitution, for the express purpose of making it Republican. Nor will any one doubt but that the citizens of Connecticut and their constitution are Republican. But how can the constitution be Republican, if their free negroes and mulattoes are citizens, and not entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States? All men cannot be equal in rights, and be deprived of all these rights, or any of them, and still be called equal, without a gross violation of the rights it declares to be sacred. Such absurdities cannot be ascribed to the wise men of Connecticut, who so recently formed this constitution. And they must be ascribed to them, if the free negroes and mulattoes are citizens, and deprived of the elective franchise. We have been taught to consider it the highest privilege of a freeman. Some extracts from the laws of that cautious and prudent people will throw much light on the question of State sovereignty, and the powers of a State to prohibit the ingress of persons from other States. By a law of the State, published in 1792, and which was since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, they have carried their powers much further than those assumed by Missouri for excluding the free negroes and mulattoes. He would read the extracts, which he had taken from their statute books. The first was in these words:

(1) "That when an inhabitant of any of the United States (this State excepted) shall come to reside in any town in this State, the civil authority, or major part of them are authorized, upon the application of the selectmen, if they judge proper, by warrant under their hands, directed to either of the constables of said town, to order said persons to be conveyed to the State from whence he or she came," &c.

Another part of the same law, in further execution of the foregoing principle, says:

(2) "The selectmen of the town are authorized to warn any person, not an inhabitant of this State, to depart such town, and the person so warned, if he does not depart, shall forfeit and pay to the treasurer of such town one dollar and sixty-seven cents per week. If such person refuses to depart, or pay his fine, such person shall be whipped on the naked body, not exceeding ten stripes, unless such person departs in ten days."

"If any such person returns, after warning, he is to be whipped again, and sent away again, and as often as there is occasion."

No argument can be drawn from the facts that Missouri makes Constitutional provisions to deprive a citizen of his right of residence, and that of Connecticut is only by law. There is no man of sense and honesty, too, who will venture to say a State may prohibit by a law those whom the Constitution protects. It would be nugatory to protect a right by the Constitution, if you can destroy it by law. The constitution of a State is paramount to all other of its laws. Then, if Connecticut can prohibit the citizens of other States from remaining or residing in that State, by a law, they will certainly permit Missouri to exclude free negroes and mulattoes by their constitution.

SENATE.

Nor could he be easily brought to believe that a citizen of Connecticut would not rather be entirely forbidden to reside in any State to which he might remove, than to be whipped out of it after he had got there. Is it not absurd, to a demonstration, for the people of a State to say the constitution of Missouri is not republican, because it provides for excluding free negroes and mulattoes from a residence, when their own laws, recently enacted, exclude all the citizens of all the rest of the Union? South Carolina, some years ago, passed a law to prohibit slaves from the Northern States, when they were selling them to the Southern people, from coming into that State; but there was an exception in favor of the servants of public functionaries and members of Congress. The laws of Connecticut do not exempt the members of Congress themselves, much less their servants. A member of Congress, going from the Southern States to Connecticut, would not conceive himself very highly honored if put under an escort of town constables; nor could he well suppose the honor enhanced by being whipped on the naked body if he should happen to return that way.

Another law of that State, published in 1796, concerning free negroes, mulattoes, and negro, mulatto, and Indian servants, is worth notice. One clause says:

"Whatsoever negro, mulatto, or Indian servant, shall be found wandering out of the bounds of the town or place to which they belong, without a ticket, or pass, in writing, to be taken up," &c.

By another clause there is a distinct and degrading restraint laid upon free negroes. It says: "No free negro is to travel without a pass from the selectmen or justices."

So careful have they been to restrain this degraded class of people, in the same law it is provided:

"That every free person shall be punished by fine, &c., for buying or receiving any thing from a free negro, mulatto, or Indian servant," &c.

If free negroes and mulattoes are citizens, why this distinct restraint on their right of locomotion more than on a white citizen? If citizens, why restrained from travelling without a pass? Who is authorized by the Constitution of the United States to prescribe the terms to a particular class of citizens, by what means they shall be suffered to pass? And who shall interdict the rest of the community from buying or receiving from a particular portion of citizens, if they are citizens?

The great and respectable State of New York would afford us some light also upon this subject. In the 42d article of the constitution of that State we find the following words:

"And this convention doth further, in the name and by the authority of the good people of this State, ordain, determine, and declare, that it shall be in the discretion of the Legislature to naturalize all such persons, and in such manner, as they shall think proper."

This remains a prominent part of the constitution of New York. She has reserved to herself, or to her Legislature, the sole right to naturalize all such persons as they shall think proper. They, perhaps, may have the power to do so; but they ought to be candid enough, at least, to allow Missouri to naturalize such persons, and in such manner as they may think proper, also. Her powers are co-ordinate. But, so far is the Legislature of New York from this, that whilst she retains the power herself, she not only denies it to the State of Missouri, but has sent her resolutions of instructions to her Senators, which now lie on your table, to endeavor, by all means, to disfranchise her for attempting to exercise this right upon free negroes and mulattoes only. With what grace she can do so, let the world judge. Her citizens, too, are declaring in their bulletins that, for this defect in the Missouri constitution, she ought to be rejected, and if admitted it will, of itself, be a complete dissolution of the union of the States.

By a law of New York, passed the 8th of April, 1801, they have shown, in the most emphatic words, the power which each State retains, of excluding from their limits all and every person who shall come therein. Nor are their means for imposing this power the least energetic. This power they have not limited to exclusion of free negroes and mulattoes only, as Missouri has done, but they have extended it to every class of citizens, of every age, sex, and denomination. He would read the several clauses. The first is in these words:

(1) "If a stranger is entertained in the dwelling-house or out-house of any citizen for fifteen days, without giving notice to the overseers of the poor, he shall pay a fine of five dollars."

This clause goes to punish any hospitable man who shall have the rashness to entertain a stranger. Whatever may be the custom of the people of that State, the laws deny to a stranger even the rights of hospitality. The next clause comes a little closer to the stranger. He would read it. It is in these words:

(2) "If such person continues above forty days, the justices can call on all the inhabitants of the town or city, and the person may be sent to jail, &c. And the justices may cause such stranger to be conveyed from constable to constable, until transported into any other State, if from thence he came."

This stranger may be a man of the purest morality, the most accomplished manners, extensive fortune, or most finished education; or he may be an object for the exercise of charity; it is immaterial which—he is put into the hands of a constable, who hands him to his brother constable, and so he goes on, until they hand him out of the State of New York. This is the first legal entertainment which a gentleman or lady, for they are to be entertained pretty much alike, are subjected to when they visit the State of New York, if they remain forty days. There was another clause, if they made a second visit, which entertains them in a different style. It is in the following words:

(3) "If such person returns, the justices, if they think proper, may direct him to be whipped by

(1) Laws of New York, vol. 1, p. 568.

(2) Laws of New York, vol. 1, p. 563.

(3) Laws of New York, vol. 1, pp. 568, 569.

'every constable into whose hands he shall come; to be whipped, if a man not exceeding thirty-nine lashes, and if a woman not exceeding twenty-five lashes. And so as often as such person shall return.'

It may be said, this law was only intended to guard against transient poor from other States. The rights of a poor man are and ought to be held, if he is a citizen of the United States, as sacred as the rights of the rich man. But this law itself has made no distinction. The constitution authorizes the Legislature to naturalize in such manner as they shall think proper. If this was the manner of naturalizing, and no other appeared yet to have been adopted, to be whipped at the public whipping post by every town constable into whose hand he should come, it was not so very inviting to foreigners; and it was more than probable that but few would like the certificate, as the registry is to be made, on the back of the man, by thirty-nine lashes, (Moses's Law;) of the woman, by twenty-five lashes. It has been remarked by enlightened travellers, that the attention to ladies is in proportion to the civilization and refined manners of nations. New York has given in this law a proof of her refinement of manners by their marked attention to ladies, as they are to receive fourteen lashes less than the gentlemen.

However romantic this may all appear, it is literally true that such a law is not only to be found in the statute books of New York, but has been enacted twelve years since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, is now in full force, and is constantly practised upon; by which they can drag from the State the most worthy gentleman or lady of the United States, by the rude hand of town constables; and, if they should dare to return, can make them hug the whipping post. Yet, with this gigantic stretch of power in full exercise by their own State, the people of that State are riding foremost in the cause of the wandering vagabond free negroes and mulattoes with a view to thrust them upon others, or with some other more unkind view.

If this concatenation of Constitutional and legal authorities, beginning with the Declaration of Independence itself, and running through the Constitution and every law of the United States, wherever the subject could occur, or be acted on, as well as a voluminous concurrence of the State constitutions and State laws, all bearing directly on this question, without a solitary case to be found to contravene them, when combined with that universal sentiment and universal rule of action of the whole of the white population of the whole nation, denying positively all the precious and valuable privileges of citizenship to free negroes and mulattoes, would not demonstrate that they were not citizens, he knew no human proof which could comprehend it.

Mr. SMITH said he should offer no more legal or Constitutional authorities. What he had offered were within the statute books and constitutions of the several States, sent here by authority of those States, as an evidence of their State policy. Therefore, those authorities could not be questioned. He had been thus tedious that he might give them chapter and verse. He had done so, because he believed the policy of the States throughout the Union, on this subject, had heretofore been but little known, and which, he thought, on this occasion, ought to be elicited. More time would, he had no doubt, have enabled him to have shown many other State regulations relating to the same purpose. Such as he had been able to obtain he had submitted, in the humble hope that they would be useful, and enable other gentlemen to improve. He knew he had consumed much time already, and more than he wished to have done; but the subject would not suffer him to abridge it, for which he begged pardon. But he had yet a little bundle for Rhode Island, which some gentlemen might not think quite applicable; but, as he had heretofore spoken of the facts contained in it, when in debate on the same subject, he would rely upon the favor of the Senate to be indulged.

What he had to read and say was nothing more than paying a compliment to Rhode Island. That State had not only been very bitter against slaveholders generally, but had been particularly so, at the last session of Congress, against Missouri, unless negro slavery should be restricted there. This he believed, however, could not have been the opinion or temper of the majority. He was warranted in this opinion by the late election, by the Legislature of that State, of a Senator to Congress. Mr. James D'Wolf was the successful candidate, and this gentleman had accumulated an immense fortune by the African slave trade. In the year of 1804 the ports of South Carolina, by an act of its Legislature, under the permission of the Constitution of the United States, were opened for the importation of Africans. They remained open four years. During that time there were two hundred and two vessels entered the port of Charleston, with African slaves. Ten of these vessels, and their African cargoes, belonged to Mr. D'Wolf. [Here Mr. BURRILL, of Rhode Island, called Mr. SMITH to order, because it was out of order to mention the name of a member, and because he was approaching the State of Rhode Island. The PRESIDENT of the Senate decided that Mr. SMITH was not out of order, as Mr. D'Wolf was not a member of the Senate, and Mr. S. proceeded.] Mr. SMITH said his object was not to reproach that respectable State, but to eulogize it. But, sir, said Mr. S., look into your archives, and you will find many memorials and remonstrances from the town meetings of the people of that State last year, not only against slavery in Missouri, but aiming at its total abolition; and reproaching the States which tolerate it. See the resolutions just laid on your table from New York, to influence your decision against Missouri. And he would here remark, that when a bill was offered by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. ROOR,) for the purpose of declaring that slavery did not exist in that State, it was objected to by the gentleman who offered the resolutions for rejecting Missouri, (Mr. J. C. SPENCER,) because, he said, it did not apply. Mr. S. observed, that he had been informed that that gentleman was the owner of several slaves himself. If that was the fact, it would not apply very well until he could find means to dispose of them. Then no doubt the thing would apply very handsomely. We are reproached for our dealing in slaves and human flesh, whenever gentlemen chose to indulge themselves, but become very fastidious when you mention facts that apply to their side of the House.

Mr. D'Wolf, he said, was trading under the authority of the laws of this Government, and it could be no reproach. He would say nothing about the African trade which he had been engaged in since it was prohibited by law, because that would very deservedly subject him to a criminal prosecution.

This subject had been forgotten in Carolina. It was supposed to be at an end. However, hearing late in the Summer that the storm was gathering to the north, and that the admission of Missouri into the Union would be opposed on account of slavery, or something springing from that source, he wrote to a friend in Charleston, to apply to the custom-house officer for a full statement of all the ships engaged in that trade during the four years, together with their owners, consignees, their places of residence, country, nation to which they belonged, &c., that he might be able to show the public who were engaged in it. In answer to his request, he had received from the custom-house books, from the hand of the collector, the following authentic documents. He would present to the Senate, in the first place, the documents which contained the years of arrival, the names of the vessels, the place to which the vessel belonged, the names of the proprietors, the names of the consignees, their country, and to where they belonged.

Here, sir, ends the black catalogue. It would show to the Senate, that those people who most deprecate the evils of slavery and traffic in human flesh, when a profitable market can be found, can sell human flesh with as easy a conscience as they sell other articles. The whole number imported by the merchants and planters of Charleston and its vicinity were only two thousand and six. Nor were the slaves imported by the foreigners, and other American vessels and owners, sold to the Carolinians, only in a small part. They were sold to the people of the Western States; Georgia, New Orleans, and a considerable quantity were sent to the West Indies, especially when the market became dull in Carolina.

When Mr. SMITH had concluded, on motion, the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, December 9.

Mr. THOMAS presented a memorial, signed by a number of individuals concerned directly or indirectly as purchasers of public lands, prior to the law "making further provision for the sale of the public lands," stating that said law operates injuriously on them, and praying that they may be permitted to apply the payments already made to such portions of their entries as such payments will cover at two dollars per acre, and that the residue may revert to the United States; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill for the relief of Morgan Brown was read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to the third reading of the bill, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis;'" and, on motion by Mr. KING, of Alabama, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to the consideration of the bill for the relief of Robert Purdy; and the consideration thereof was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians; and the consideration thereof was further postponed to Monday next.

RESTRICTION OF SLAVERY.

Mr. TICHENOR communicated the following resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Vermont; which were read:

STATE OF VERMONT,

In General Assembly, Nov. 15, 1820.

The committee, to whom was referred so much of his Excellency's speech as relates to the admission of the Territory of Missouri into the Union as a State, submit the following report:

The history of nations demonstrates that involuntary servitude not only plunges the slave into the depths of misery, but renders a great proportion of community dependent and wretched, and the remainder tyrannic and indolent.

Opulence, acquired by the slavery of others, degenerates its possessors, and destroys the physical powers of government. Principles so degrading are inconsistent with the primitive dignity of man, and his natural rights.

Slavery is incompatible with the vital principles of all free governments, and tends to their ruin. It paralyzes industry, the greatest source of national wealth, stifles the love of freedom, and endangers the safety of the nation.

It is prohibited by the laws of nature, which are equally binding on governments and individuals. The right to introduce and establish slavery in a free government does not exist.

The Declaration of Independence declares, as self-evident truths, "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it."

The Constitution of the United States, and of the several States, have recognised these principles as the basis of their Governments, and have expressly inhibited the introduction or extension of slavery, or impliedly disavowed the right.

The powers of Congress to require the prohibition of slavery in the constitution of a State, to be admitted as one of the United States, is confirmed by the admission of new States according to the ordinance of 1787, and by a Constitutional "guarantee to every State in the Union of a republican form of government." This power in Congress is also admitted in the act of March 6, 1820, which declares that, in all that territory ceded under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes north latitude, "slavery and involuntary servitude shall be forever prohibited."

Where slavery existed in the States, at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, a spirit of compromise, or painful necessity, may have excused its continuance; but can never justify its introductio into a State to be admitted from the Territories of the United States.

Though slavery is not expressly prohibited by the Constitution, yet that invaluable instrument contains powers, first principles, and self-evident truths, which bring us to the same result, and lead us to Liberty and Justice, and the equal rights of man, from which we ought never to depart. "In it is clearly seen a deep and humiliating sense of slavery," and a cheering hope that it would, at some future period, be abolished—and even a determination to do it.

It is apparent that servitude produces, in the slaveholding States, peculiar feelings, local attachments, and separate interests; and, should it be extended into new States, "it will have a tendency to form a combination of power which will control the measures of the General Government," and which cannot be resisted, except by the physical force of the nation.

The people of the United States adopted the Constitution "to form a more perfect union of the several States, to establish justice, to secure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty;" and have thereby blended, and inseparably connected the interests, the safety, and welfare, of every State in the Union. We, therefore, become deeply concerned in the fundamental principles of the constitution of any new State to be admitted into the Union. Whatever powers are necessary to carry into effect the great objects of the Union are implied in the Constitution, and vested in the several departments of the General Government.

The act of the United States authorizing a provisional admission of Missouri into the Union as a State, does not pledge the faith of the Government to admit whatever may be its constitution or system of State government; for that constitution, by the act, must be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

From information, it is to be seriously apprehended that Missouri will present to Congress, for their approbation, a constitution which declares, that "the General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws—first, for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owners, or without paying them, before emancipation, a full equivalent for such slaves so emancipated;" and, "secondly," to prevent emigrants from bringing slaves into said State, so long as slavery is legalized therein.

It is also made the imperious duty of its Legislature to pass laws, as soon as may be, "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, that State, under any pretence whatever."

These powers, restrictions, and provisions, to legalize and perpetuate slavery, and to prevent citizens of the United States, on account of their origin, color, or features, from emigrating to Missouri, are repugnant to a republican government, and in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States.

If Missouri be permitted to introduce and legalize slavery by her constitution, and we consent to her admission, we shall justly incur the charge of insincerity in our civil institutions, and in all our professions of attachment to liberty. It will bring upon the Constitution and Declaration of Independence a deep stain, which cannot be forgotten or blotted out. "It will deeply affect the Union in its resources, political interests, and character."

The admission of another new State into the Union with a constitution which guaranties security and protection to slavery, and the cruel and unnatural traffic of any portion of the human race, will be an error which the Union cannot correct, and an evil which may endanger the freedom of the nation.

Congress never ought, and we trust never will, plant the standard of the Union in Missouri, to wave over the heads of involuntary slaves, "who have nothing they can call their own, except their sorrows and their sufferings," and a life beyond the grave, and who can never taste the sweets of liberty, unless they obtain it by force or by flight. Nor can a community made up of masters and slaves ever enjoy the blessings of liberty, and the benefits of a free government; these enjoyments are reserved for a community of freemen, who are subject to none, but to God and the laws.

The committee, therefore, submit for the consideration of the General Assembly the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, slavery, or involuntary servitude, in any of the United States, is a moral and political evil, and that its continuance can be justified by necessity alone.

That Congress has a right to inhibit any further introduction or extension of slavery, as one of the conditions upon which any new State shall be admitted into the Union.

Resolved, That this Legislature views with regret and alarm the attempt of the inhabitants of Missouri to obtain admission into the Union, as one of the United States, under a constitution which legalizes and secures the introduction and continuance of slavery; and also contains provisions to prevent freemen of the United States from emigrating to and settling in Missouri, on account of their origin, color, and features. And that, in the opinion of this Legislature, these principles, powers, and restrictions, contained in the reputed constitution of Missouri, are anti-republican, and repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and subversive of the inalienable rights of man.

Resolved, That the Senators from this State, in the Congress of the United States, be instructed, and the Representatives requested, to exert their influence and use all legal means to prevent the admission of Missouri, as a State, into the Union of the United States, with those anti-republican features and powers in their constitution.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to transmit a copy of the foregoing report and resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States.

ADMISSION OF MISSOURI.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the consent of Congress to the admission of the State of Missouri.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, it is not my intention to trouble the Senate with any remarks on that part of the constitution of Missouri which recognises the right to hold slaves. The act of the last session has settled that question; and, in spite of the reasoning in the Vermont memorial just read, and the authority from whence it emanates, I feel bound by a solemn compact to admit Missouri, unless it is manifest that her constitution is repugnant to that of the United States. The honorable gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. BURRILL) who opposed this resolution, gives up the ground of restriction; and I understand that he, and other gentlemen who think with him on that subject, would consent to the admission of Missouri, if her constitution does not contravene any provision of the Constitution of the United States, nor the act of last session which authorizes her admission. The honorable gentleman from Rhode Island did, to be sure, suggest some objections not strictly consistent with this admission, on which he did not seem to place much reliance, and which probably were not, in his mind, insuperable. He thinks it was improper, and somewhat indecorous, that the act was not incorporated in the constitution, or at least referred to by the convention as the ground of their proceedings. But, if they have complied with the provisions and conditions of the act, it is equally binding as if they had recited the whole, and the constitution itself is more concise, explicit, and intelligible.

Another objection is, that the constitution of Missouri allows emigration from the State, but prohibits free blacks and mulattoes from coming in and settling. This is charged upon Missouri as an inconsistency. But surely there can be nothing inconsistent in this. The people are forming a compact, and one of its provisions is, that those members of the State who shall become dissatisfied may abandon it. "Go," they say, "when you please, and where you can. We give you no warrant to break open the doors of our neighbors and force them to receive you against their consent. We allow no such liberties to be taken with us." This is the substance of the provision. It surely is neither inconsistent nor illiberal.

Passing by these objections, which were not urged with much confidence or zeal, I come to that which is principally relied on. Free negroes and mulattoes are to be prohibited by law from coming to and settling in the State; and this, it is contended, contravenes that clause of the Constitution of the United States which provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

The honorable gentleman from Rhode Island contends that this prohibition would exclude them from entering the State, even without an intent to settle. This construction makes the clause consist of two distinct prohibitions, the one against entering, the other settling; and this absurdity would result—that the legislature should prohibit free blacks without from coming in, and free blacks within from settling. The true construction is—that they are not to be permitted to come in and settle.

It is true that it is made imperative on the legislature to exclude free blacks and mulattoes, and they are not to be admitted to settlement in the State, under any pretext whatever. Had the expression been all free blacks and mulattoes, the legislature could have made no exceptions. But the omission of the word "all" leaves them a discretion; and other provisions in their constitution limit the extent of the prohibition, and expound its meaning.

All purchasers of lands in Missouri, previous to the law enacted under this clause, are expressly provided for. A purchase of lands by deed is "a contract executed." The covenants in the deed secure to the purchaser the right to hold, possess, and enjoy. Should the purchaser be lawfully excluded from the possession, the covenant or "contract" is broken. If the State by law excludes a purchaser from his possession, it impairs the obligation of the contract. In the celebrated Georgia case in relation to the Yazoo purchase, it was determined that a law annulling a precedent sale was void, as impairing the obligation of a contract. And whatever law takes from a purchaser the benefit of any covenant in his deed is void, being repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Now, there is the same clause in the constitution of Missouri as in that of the United States. Any law, therefore, which should exclude a precedent purchaser from the enjoyment of his purchase would be contrary to a provision in the bill of rights of Missouri. Wherefore, taking these two provisions together, the meaning is this: "the legislature shall exclude free blacks and mulattoes, provided they are not purchasers of lands within the State."

This reasoning will apply to all soldiers who hold under the United States, and all subsequent purchasers under them will be also excepted by another provision in the constitution of Missouri. Among the terms and conditions in the act of last session, Missouri is never to interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States, nor with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers. Now, a title is never perfected, or "secured," unless the purchaser has, not only the rights of property and possession, but the possession itself. To prohibit a purchaser under the United States from enjoying the possession, would most unquestionably interfere with those regulations which Congress might adopt to secure the title to the purchaser. But it is still more manifest that it would be an interference with the "primary disposal" of the soil. Could Missouri, without a violation of this compact, provide that no purchaser of the United States' lands in the State should possess or enjoy it? If not, how can she prohibit any portion of purchasers from this possession or enjoyment? If, in the sale of a dwelling-house, which I had the right to prevent, I should covenant not to interfere, should I fulfil my covenant by prohibiting the purchaser from entering and inhabiting it? Here, then, is a positive stipulation made a part of the constitution of Missouri, and unalterable without the consent of Congress, which expressly excepts from the prohibition all purchasers of the United States. The whole power given, then, taken in connexion with the rest of the constitution, is to exclude free blacks and mulattoes from the State, except purchasers of every description, before the act of exclusion, and purchasers of the United States, whether before or after. Inasmuch, then, as we find express limitations to this power, and the word "all" not inserted in the prohibition, and the members of the legislature bound by oath to support the Constitution of the United States, would it not be fair to expound this clause to extend to those cases only which are not repugnant to this Constitution?

Having, as it is believed, ascertained the extent and meaning of the clause objected to, let us, before we proceed to a discussion of the part of the Constitution of the United States said to be infringed, glance for a moment at some of the inconveniences which would result from denying to a State the power to exclude free blacks and mulattoes.

These are an unfortunate class. They, or their ancestors, having been subjected to the control of a master, are most of them ignorant and poor, and many of them infirm, decrepid, and vicious. Their vices and frailties render them an encumbrance, if not a nuisance, wherever they reside. It is just that the evils arising from such a population should be sustained by those who have had the benefit of their labor, and who have contributed in some measure to their degradation. To confine them to the State by whose laws they or their ancestors were enslaved, and compel that State to administer to their relief without imposing a burden on their neighbors, comports as well with justice as humanity. These reasons have prevailed in almost every State in the Union, and have produced exclusion laws of the same character and principle, and of greater extent, than the offensive clause in the constitution of Missouri. The people of Missouri, possessing a territory whose soil and products would not admit of a numerous slave population, whose extent and climate would afford facilities to emigrants, and whose vicinity to States and Territories having a crowded black population, would induce an inundation of this description of people, have thought it prudent, the better to facilitate the emancipation of their own slaves, and to improve the condition of their own free blacks and mulattoes, to prohibit their emigration from other States.

If a State does not possess this power, the condition of the non-slaveholding States is most alarming. A free black population is fast increasing and gaining upon the whites, in the slaveholding States. An asylum for these unfortunate people is now become important, and will be more so. This has been an object of solicitude with all the colonization and abolition societies, and all the friends of freedom and humanity. Slaves would be manumitted if they could be transported. But to let them loose among an already crowded free black population, would make them miserable and dangerous. Send them to St. Domingo, you subject them to the disposal of a cruel tyrant; transport them to Africa, and they are food for pestilence; colonize them on the Columbia river, and they will be butchered and eaten by the Indians.

To this time, no suitable place has been found which afforded a safe and comfortable retreat for the emancipated slave. But this doctrine has solved the doubt and removed the difficulty. Free blacks are citizens and may go where they will, or where their emancipators shall please to send. All the slaves in a State may be made free at once, on condition of their removal to a non-slaveholding State, and this State cannot prevent it. The New England States are probably in little danger from this principle. It is the States bordering on the slaveholding States which will experience its tendency and effect. Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, are now thinly populated and little cultivated. Vast tracts of land in them are owned by the United States. The State of Virginia, for example, might purchase some millions of acres and parcel them out in small lots, as gratuities to her free blacks who should emigrate and settle them. Such an event would probably create no uneasiness at first, in a State which had the power at any time to prevent it. The non-slaveholding States might even for the sake of humanity encourage it, having a discretion at all times to check it when it should become dangerous. But to be forced, against our will, to receive free blacks from the slaveholding States, is a doctrine that I, as a northern man, do not so fully relish, and to which I cannot subscribe without the fullest examination and strongest necessity. This effect has been perceived, and some have attempted to avoid it by making a distinction between free and freed blacks. The former only having been born free, it is said, are citizens. The latter are a degraded class, not entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens, and can therefore be prohibited from entering and settling in a State. This distinction is entirely visionary. It neither comports with reason nor humanity. It is the local authority, the State sovereignty which makes a slave. The same supreme power which deprives a man of his freedom can restore it, and restore it, too, in its highest perfection. The same power which makes a slave can make him free, and advance him to the highest privileges of a citizen. If this power does not exist in the States, it exists nowhere; and this absurdity would necessarily follow, that there is no power in this country to convert a slave into a citizen. The Constitution of the United States gives no such right to Congress. They have the power to establish uniform rules of naturalization; but naturalization is the converting a foreigner into a citizen. To suppose an emancipated negro, whose ancestors had resided here ever since the settlement of the country, and who had never quitted the plantation where he was born, could be made a citizen by naturalization, and in no other way, is an absurdity too gross and palpable to be seriously entertained. It hence follows, inevitably, that an emancipated slave may, if the State will it, be placed on the same footing as any other free black, and one may be a citizen as well as the other. The State which gave them their freedom for purposes of emigration would take care to obtain its object by breaking down this distinction if it ever existed.

The honorable gentleman from Rhode Island disregards this distinction, and takes broader ground still. His definition of a citizen comprehends all the inhabitants except slaves and foreigners. With free blacks and mulattoes, he includes convicts, disolute persons, paupers, and vagabonds. Yet he seems to admit that a State may exclude for personal demerit. And who establishes the standard of merit, and makes the discrimination? The State. By what rule is it governed? Discretion, policy, expediency. It is the State law which defines who are worthy of a residence within the State. What, then, becomes of his definition, but that it includes all but those which a State may, in its discretion, except? If a State can fix a name of disgrace or demerit on any population, and exclude them, the point is yielded that free blacks may be excluded.

If this definition of the honorable gentleman be correct, it would be much the safest inference that one State might exclude all the population of another, except those which the Constitution of the United States specially authorizes. Self-protection seems to require that a State should retain the power to prevent a troublesome or dangerous population. In doing this, they might exclude those who are useful and respectable. Of this there is no danger. The State from which they would emigrate would not wish to spare them; and that to which they would come, would always find it for its interest to receive them. The Constitution of the United States would provide for all who have a duty to perform under that Constitution, and the laws; members of Congress, and judges of courts, must perform federal duties. The President must command the Army and Navy and the Militia, when in service; the soldiers must be called to suppress insurrection and repel invasion. To all these and others, having federal duties to perform, the Constitution says "go;" and a State cannot oppose. The clause of the Constitution of the United States said to be infringed by this of Missouri, by no means repels this construction. The citizens of one State are to enjoy "all the privileges and immunities of citizens," when "in" another. The State is left at its option whether it will receive the citizens of another as residents. It may impose restrictions which amount to prohibition; but if the citizen does come, by express or implied consent, this clause secures him "the privileges and immunities," and subjects him to the duties and disabilities of citizens.

I do not say that this construction admits of no doubts or difficulties. But I do say, that, upon this broad definition, it is the safest and most consistent with the practice and rights of the States. And I can never admit the principle that free blacks of any description, and to any extent, may fix their residence in a State against its consent.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) with much talent and industry, has given us a history of the practice, and proved that this power claimed by Missouri has been exercised by nearly every State in the Union, and the right has never before been questioned. The subject has been so fully and ably presented, that no further time need be occupied in discussing it.

Permit me now to take a different view of the subject, and endeavor to present a construction of the Constitution which will avoid the difficulties.

Gentlemen, I apprehend, reason from wrong premises. In the broad and comprehensive definition of citizen, lies the error. Let us endeavor to select a meaning for the word which will comport with the Constitution, the practice, and the convenience. The Constitution of the United States has nowhere defined it; it occurs on five different occasions in that Constitution—in prescribing the qualification of Representative, Senator, and President, in giving jurisdiction to the Federal Court, and in the controverted clause. In the three first cases, no one will pretend that it is to be taken in this unlimited sense. That the framers of the Constitution intended that blacks and mulattoes might be members of Congress or Presidents, is a supposition too absurd to be for a moment entertained. Gentlemen, with all their humanity, to be obliged to sit in this Senate by a black man, would consider their rights invaded. The section of the Constitution which gives jurisdiction to the courts, uses it in a different sense, but gives it no precise definition. If all entitled to be parties to suits are citizens, and those only, then a large and respectable portion of the community are excluded, and probably resident foreigners included. The word here is inaptly used, and intended in this case to mean the same as inhabitant. The laws of Congress are as deficient in furnishing a meaning as the Constitution. But, as the naturalization laws have uniformly restricted the right to become citizens to free white persons, so far as practice is to influence a decision, it is in favor of the constitutionality of the objectionable clause.

The word was never used by the ancient Republics, but to include privileges and immunities of a high character. In the Grecian States, these privileges were preserved with much tenacity, and conferred with much solemnity. The Romans divided their inhabitants into citizens, subjects, freedmen, and slaves. To be a Roman citizen was a proud distinction, and carried with it privileges and immunities of the highest order. After the subversion of the Roman Empire, and some time in the eleventh century, cities began to be established or incorporated in Europe, and first in Italy, and the inhabitants entitled to their freedom and liberties were called citizens. These, principally, were to elect and be elected, and to bear arms in their own defence, under commanders of their own choice.

The best definition of citizen, according to European writers, which I have been able to find, is "a native or inhabitant of a city, vested with its freedom and liberties." The "freedom and liberties," or "privileges and immunities" essential to a citizen, were those I have mentioned; and, although the name was originally confined to the inhabitant of a city, yet when these principles were diffused among and conferred on the inhabitants of the country, they, having the same attributes, took the same name.

The rights of an American citizen are essentially the same: to elect, be elected, and bear arms in his defence; they are essential, for, divest him of these, and you divest him of his citizenship. He has other essential rights, such as those of property and personal security under the protection of laws fairly administered; but he has these in common with foreigners, and in some respects with slaves. No person can be said to be entitled to the privileges of an American citizen, unless he can have an agency in the formation or administration of the laws; that agency may be prospective, but a perpetual exclusion from this deprives him of the essential attributes of a citizen; but these attributes are conferred or withheld by the will of the State, legally or constitutionally expressed; a citizen, therefore, has his character from the State of which he is a member; the State may deprive him of it, and again restore it back; as it can totally destroy it, so it can create it in its highest perfection. It would seem, then, inevitable that, inasmuch as the privileges of citizenship are conferred or withheld by each State at its will, they may be and almost unavoidably must be different in different States. The question then presents, what "privileges and immunities of citizens have the free blacks of Missouri? And we see at once they have none. By the charter which you made for them, free blacks can neither elect nor be elected, and this disability is made perpetual by their constitution. By the existing territorial laws they cannot bear arms without being housekeepers and having a license from the civil authority; nor act as jurors in any case, nor testify as witnesses, except in suits between persons of their own color. The free black of Missouri, then, has no privileges of citizenship there. Then, can a free black citizen of Maine have any greater privileges or immunities in Missouri, than her own free blacks? Does a citizen of one State going to another carry his political condition with him or assume that of the State where he goes? The former principle breaks down every qualification required by a constitution of a State, and authorizes one State to confer privileges for the whole. No gentleman has, I believe, pretended to insist on such a construction. A citizen of Maine entitled to elect and be elected, goes to Virginia; the constitution of Maine made him an elector without property and with a year's residence; that of Virginia requires a freehold and further residence; does he instantaneously become an elector in Virginia, or must he be subjected to the disabilities of Virginians conditioned like him? He must submit of course to the laws of the State to which he goes. But in Maine a free black is a citizen; he goes to Virginia—can he there have any other privileges and immunities than the free blacks of Virginia? By the same rule, certainly not; if he could, the free blacks of Virginia might emigrate to Maine, tarry a year, become electors there, and return, bringing with them the elective franchise, which they could exercise in spite of the constitution of Virginia. A person, then, going from one State to another, takes all the privileges and immunities, and is subject to all the restraints and disabilities as to residence, property, age, and color, of the people of the State where he goes. If, then, free blacks and mulattoes going into Missouri could have no privileges and immunities of citizens when there, she has a right to exclude them.

Their right to go is only by inference. They are entitled, you say, to certain privileges and immunities when there; and therefore they have a right to go. We answer, they are entitled to no privileges and immunities of citizens, when there; and therefore Missouri has a right to exclude them.

A contrary decision would moreover be against all precedent, and the constant practice of most of the States in the Union. When a contest for power between the United States and a State occurs, it becomes this Senate jealously to guard those rights which it was constituted to preserve. The tendency of the Federal Government is to acquire by slow and imperceptible encroachments on the rights of the States—one acquisition may succeed another until there shall be nothing left.

It is, furthermore, unusual strictly to scrutinize every clause of a constitution of a new State, on her admission into the Union. Reject a State for one objectionable clause, and, if you err, the error cannot be easily corrected. Admit her, and, if a clause is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, it is inoperative and void, and would be annulled by a judicial decision. The State would be, in the Union, pruned of the offensive limb, and the residue of her constitution would remain.

This is a question which may be very safely trusted with the Judiciary. Who are the parties to the compact in the act of last session? The United States and Missouri. Missouri contends that she has complied with the terms, and demands a fulfilment on our part. We refuse, and charge her with a failure to fulfil her stipulations. Who is to decide? Will we insist on deciding our own case, or will we consent to the decision of an umpire? There is no risk on our part in submitting the question to the Supreme Court. In questions of State and Federal powers, they have, I believe, never been suspected of leaning very far in favor of the former. Indeed, it is not in the nature of men placed as they are to do it. Their origin, compensation, responsibility, and pride, all forbid it. If the people of Missouri are willing to submit to this tribunal, we act not as an honorable man would act with his neighbor if we refuse.

But suppose you insist on the objection. Is it by any means certain that you may not produce a state of things perplexing, if not dangerous? I do not pretend that Missouri will resist your authority. My fear is, that you cannot agree to exercise it.

Suppose a case, not improbable,—suppose Missouri rejected by a disagreement between the two Houses of Congress—one branch believing that she has complied with the conditions, is a State, and entitled to admission; the other believing that she has failed to comply, and must retire back to her territorial condition. You promised Missouri two things—a State government, and admission into the Union. She is in the enjoyment of one, and demands the other. One House of Congress is willing she should enjoy the other, and the other House refuses, and demands that she should yield up what she has obtained. One House having a negative on the other, what could be done? The necessity should be strong, and the case clear, before I would hazard such a state of things. But, so far from the case being clear, and the necessity strong, it is manifest, I think, that you have no power, and, if you had, it is not only unnecessary, but impolitic and unsafe, to exercise it. The propositions upon which I have insisted, and endeavored to maintain, are these:

The "privileges and immunities" of citizens are nowhere extended to free blacks and mulattoes, by the Constitution of the United States nor laws of Congress.

The constitution and laws of the States are alone capable of conferring them.

The State of Missouri has not conferred them on this class of her population.

Black citizens of other States acquire no other privileges and immunities there than her own black population.

But the latter are not citizens there, nor are the former; and, as the former could have no privileges and immunities of citizens there, they may be excluded.

Mr. OTIS, of Massachusetts, said that, in presenting to the Senate a few general observations upon the question before them, he would take leave to begin where the honorable gentleman, (Mr. HOLMES,) who had just sat down, had left off. That gentleman had enlarged upon the consequences to be apprehended from the rejection of Missouri, under her present constitution, in terms adapted to excite alarm. But while he admitted that, in all cases, where discretion can be exercised, the consequences of measures, as they might affect not only the welfare but the feelings of the people, and their disposition to execute the laws, should justly be regarded; yet when the dictates of conscience, and the obligation of oaths, and language of the Constitution, left no alternative, it was the part of those who had duties to perform to discharge them with firmness, after due deliberation, and to trust to the consequences and effects. This would be his course, under any view to be imagined, of the reception of the fate of their application for admission by the good people of Missouri. But he did not permit himself to indulge any fears of such results as had been intimated. His respect for that people, and his persuasion of their knowledge of their true interests, banished from his mind every suspicion of a temper that would lead them to adopt rash and violent measures, and embroil themselves with the Union upon a question of Constitutional law, which it would be so much easier to settle by an amicable adjustment. He was sorry that the question had arisen, and had presumed that the people of Missouri would have placed themselves in a condition to claim their admission, upon the ground of a compliance with the terms held forth to them by Congress; and thus to have disarmed the opposition of such of the former minority as might have considered those terms binding on the public faith. But this they had not done, and, although some inconvenience might be attached to the course they had taken, the only remedy could be found in a course of reasonable and moderate measures on the part of themselves and their friends.

The resolution upon the table, said Mr. O., contains a proposition, which Congress is either bound to adopt of course, as a ministerial act, or upon which they are entitled to exercise a sound discretion. But propositions of the first description, calling upon Congress to register the acts of another State, and to do, pro forma, what was already done in substance without their consent, were, as he humbly conceived, anomalies entirely unknown to the Constitution, and not recognised by any rules or proceedings of this House.

Under the sanction of an act of Congress, the people of Missouri have been authorized to form a constitution, subject to certain limitations and conditions, and thereupon to become an integral part of the Union. How, then, is it possible to advance a step without reading and examining their constitution, and deciding upon the fact whether or not they have complied with these terms? To a certain extent, he presumed, this investigation would be admitted on all sides to be indispensable; without it, who can tell whether she has confined herself within the prescribed territorial limits? Who would know that she had not extended her claim of jurisdiction to the Rocky mountains? We may also be entitled to ascertain whether she has established a republican or a monarchical government; whether she arrogates the power of making peace and war, regulating commerce, collecting imposts, or other powers inhibited in express terms of the Constitution to the several States. If, then, we not only may carry our researches thus far, but should be bound in duty not to shut our eyes against these flagrant assumptions of power, who will say where the line of discrimination begins, and class under their proper heads those invasions of the Constitution which we are held to notice, and those at which it behooves us to wink?

Gentlemen who deny this right of Congress to decide upon a question placed before them for decision, insist with great vehemence that Missouri is a State, and, of consequence, that her members are entitled to their seats; and if she be not a State, they call upon us to describe her actual condition, and to say what she is. But, to say nothing of the inference which seems unavoidable, that, upon this hypothesis, the proceedings of Congress are superfluous, and the foundation for all debate is removed, and the members need only offer themselves to be qualified; it might with equal truth be affirmed that Missouri would be a State, if she had made a Governor for life, or instituted an hereditary Senate, or claimed the public lands, or, in many other particulars, trenching upon the rights of the General Government, and held the terms of the proffered admission in contempt. But the assumption of her being a State is a fallacy—a begging of the question—and an illusion, arising from the repetition of a high-sounding word. In truth, the people of the United States, by their Congress, are parties to an executory contract. The people of Missouri are the other parties. The former have granted to the latter the faculty of becoming a State, when, among other things, they shall have formed a constitution not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Now, by what law or usage, or principle of natural equity, does a party, who, by certain acts to be performed on his part, is to be entitled to the benefit of a subsequent act to be performed by another party, become the sole judge of his own fulfilment and perfect claim? Has not the party who is called upon to make the last concession a right to be satisfied? If there be a controversy and a tribunal, will not this last mentioned party stand upon his defence? In the ordinary transactions of civil life there could be no doubt. Why, then, is it expected that Congress should surrender an advantage which every individual would retain? Congress, it may be said, cannot be arraigned before any tribunal, neither can it be impleaded upon any of the innumerable private pecuniary claims that are constantly made upon its justice. In these cases it invariably makes a law for itself. Doubtful claims are always rejected; and there could be no consistency in reserving scrupulously the power of deciding upon demands for money and services, which are often paltry and insignificant, and shrinking from decisions which involve the civil or political rights of any portion of the people, however poor and humble their condition. It is, then, entirely fallacious to insist that Missouri, by taking advantage of her own wrong, has become a State, and precluded your right of inquiring into her condition. The fallacy is apparent when the inquiry is made, is she a State of that description which is entitled to be admitted into the Union? This involves the further questions, Is her constitution republican? Is it conformable to the Constitution of the United States? Has she complied with the precedent conditions annexed to her grant? If in these points her constitution is defective, it is not incumbent on those who oppose her admission to waive their objections in consequence of the change of name or organization; neither is it essential to give her a name, or to define the heteroclitic condition in which she has placed herself; though he saw no difficulty in saying she was yet a Territory, in her transit towards the condition of one of the United States, and none in providing by law (especially with a kindly concurrence on the part of that people) for an adaptation of the present form of her government to her territorial condition, until that should be changed.

The honorable gentleman from South Carolina had asserted, with great confidence, that several States had been admitted into the Union without any evidence to be found on record of an examination into the provisions of their constitution. "Several of those States were without constitutions," and, "why," exclaimed the gentleman, triumphantly, "do you not issue a quo warranto against Rhode Island and other States?" To this, said Mr. O., the answer is most obvious. Rhode Island, Vermont, and North Carolina, had the option, at the time of the formation of the Federal Government, of becoming parties to it at pleasure. They were independent States, acting as such, and their constitutions or forms of government were subjects of notoriety to the other States with whom they had united under the Old Confederation. They did not adopt the Constitution of the United States at the same epoch with the other States, but there was a perfect understanding of their being at liberty to send in their adhesion; and, when they did so, nothing was wanting but laws extending to them the jurisdiction of the Union. In respect to every other State, it was manifest that their several constitutions had been submitted to the inspection of Congress, as would be demonstrated by a recurrence to its acts, and although the form of the resolutions adopted of late years had not been originally observed. The State of Virginia, by an act of December, 1789, authorized Kentucky to become a State at some period subsequent to 1791, at a time to be fixed by the people. They accordingly formed a constitution, and determined that the era of its active supremacy should be in June, 1792. Meanwhile Congress convened, and determined on the same time for its admission into the Union, and, by necessary intentment, must have had before them the constitution as it had been adopted. In the act extending to Ohio the benefit of certain laws of the Union, there is an express recognition of her having framed a republican form of government. In the instance of Tennessee, there was a debate upon a clause in her constitution, which shows that the instrument was before Congress; and, since the time of her admission, a more precise formality has been observed in every instance. Nothing, therefore, he contended, was to be gained by the gentleman's reliance upon precedents, which were all against him. Having thus, (continued Mr. O.,) established it to be the right and duty of Congress to examine this instrument, he should proceed to state and to support his objection arising upon the face of it, and it was shortly to the clause which made it the duty of the Legislature of the new State to prevent the ingress and settlement of free people of color, under any pretext whatsoever, within its boundaries. This requisition being, at first blush, in palpable collision with the clause of the United States' Constitution which provides for a community of rights for the citizens of one State with those of any other State into which we may go, there is no refuge from the objection but in a bold denial of the fact, that free persons of color may be citizens of some one State. And, to do justice to the candor of gentlemen, it must be allowed they enter the lists with manly frankness, and, in so many words, deny to people of color this capacity of citizenship; and it follows as a corollary, that they deny also the right of any one State to confer that capacity upon them. They call upon us to show what constitutes a citizen, and especially to prove that persons of color were at all considered as coming under that denomination, in any compact made with each other by the people of the United States. It would require more time than could be fairly claimed by any individual, to do justice to this subject under all its aspects, but he trusted a very few remarks would be sufficient for a satisfactory confutation of this novel theory. For his greater security, however, he would confine himself to the circumstances which would give to a man the right of citizenship in Massachusetts; for if a man of color could be a citizen there, he would carry his privilege elsewhere. In that State, he said, at the time of the Revolution, the people were considered as retaining all such portions of the common law of England as were applicable to their circumstances. By that law, the people of England were distinguished into citizens, denizens, and aliens. In Massachusetts, they were also either citizens or aliens; and he had no doubt he might safely contend that in all the States they were either citizens, aliens, or slaves. All persons born within the realm of England were citizens. All persons born in Massachusetts, of free parents, were citizens; and all persons in that State, not aliens or slaves, (and there could be none of the latter, though perhaps a fugitive slave might have been considered as an alien prior to the federal stipulations on that point,) were of consequence free citizens.

To this relationship of a free citizen to his State, protection and allegiance were the necessary incidents, and these imply, of necessity, a right to reside within the jurisdiction, and to be secure of life, liberty, and property, under the guardianship of the laws. Every citizen is held to serve the State in time of public danger and of war, and to contribute to the public burdens. He is entitled to redress when injured by a foreign Power; to be reclaimed when unjustly captured or detained; and when he brings an action for land, alienage cannot be pleaded in bar to his demand. If he possesses these rights, and stands in this relation to the State, he is a citizen. In Massachusetts, many persons of color existed in this relation to the State, and he should believe, until the contrary was shown, that the same was true in every State in the nation. To strengthen this construction, he quoted the 4th article of the first Confederation, which ordains that the "free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States," and "shall have free ingress and regress," &c. He also quoted, from the Journals of the Old Congress, the resolve which formed the basis of the new constitution, and which recommends the apportionment of taxes upon the numbers of "white and other free citizens," and made comments upon them, which he considered as conclusive in favor of his construction. Pursuant to these principles, it was familiar to all that persons of this description had received grants of land for serving in your army, and had been reclaimed among your impressed seamen.

Now, against these facts and plain reasoning, he was aware of but one objection adduced by gentlemen who had preceded him. These men were not citizens, it is said, in every State, because in nearly all, if not in every State, they are, or have been, made liable to certain disabilities not common to the free white citizens. All the arguments of gentlemen upon this point, however diversified, and the immensely voluminous citations from the statute books of the different States, terminated in this one objection. It was, therefore, the soundness of this single foundation stone, and that alone, which he was called upon to examine. To this, then, his first answer was, that a class of citizens may, under certain circumstances, be subjected to particular disqualifications, without being thereby disfranchised.* In every country women and minors are subject to disqualifications—the former are such as are perpetual. In some, large classes are debarred from the power of electing, or being elected, to office. An unjust Government may create many odious distinctions between its privileged orders and other citizens; and a just Government, from motives of sound policy, may exclude a minor class of the community from certain civil and political rights, enjoyed by the rest, and yet leave the excluded or restricted class in the condition of citizens. The right of protection in life, liberty, and property; of residence, and of inheritable blood; of taking and transmitting, by descent, lands, and chattels, may all be unimpaired, and, while they remain so, it is impossible to say that a man ceases to be a citizen. Certainly, Republics formed upon the model of the United States will abstain from all permanent distinctions among their citizens, not founded in unavoidable necessity, or the all-controlling force of public opinion; and perhaps the case in contemplation is the only one that can ever arise to authorize or induce the annexation of perpetual disqualifications for political or civil trusts to qualities which are in themselves innocent and personal. But it might be otherwise; and if a State, by its constitution, were empowered to restrain its citizens from wearing arms or killing game, or discharging certain political or civil functions, laws made pursuant to such authority would not operate an extinguishment of the rights of the citizen, hateful and oppressive as they would be in themselves. Again, cases may be supposed to exist in which one description of citizens may have assented, either expressly or by implication, to enjoy the rights of citizenship under some limitations. And, perhaps, the consent of the colored free people who remained in our country at the epoch of our Independence, or who, being born within the United States, have since become the voluntary inhabitants of any State, in which such limitations have prevailed from time immemorial, may fairly be presumed to have acquiesced in the legality of such limitations, and to be concluded

* An act of Parliament, in the time of William III., provides, in substance, that "no person, born out of the kingdom of England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the dominions thereto belonging, although he be naturalized and made a denizen, (except such as are born of English parents,) shall be capable to be of the privy council, or a member of either House of Parliament, or to enjoy any office or place of trust, either civil or military, or to have any grant of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, from the Crown, to himself, or others in trust for him." Each State, prior to the Confederation, and subsequent to the Revolution, had the same powers, in regard to this subject, as the British Parliament.

by their own consent. Still they may be citizens. Modifications of the rights of citizenship were familiar to the laws of Rome prior to the time of Justinian; and, in fact, most of the distinctions of the privileged orders in modern Governments, when fairly examined, may be referred to the same principles, and are neither more nor less than rights of citizenship differently graduated. Believing, therefore, in the correctness of this exposition, he considered all arguments drawn from the laws of the several States, respecting free people of color, to be entirely irrelevant to the subject, unless it could be made manifest that these laws had not merely been confined to a limitation of their political or civil privileges, but had entirely annulled all that portion of them which were essential to constitute the relation of citizen. In no State, he contended, had they yet been carried to this extreme; and, while any one of them could be found, in whose jurisdiction these persons were citizens, it would follow that they could not be disentitled to become citizens in any other State. The honorable gentleman from South Carolina had occupied an entire day, principally in reading and commenting upon the laws of the respective States, from North to South, discriminating between the white and colored people, in support of his broad denial of the capacity of citizenship to the latter. However amusing and enlivening those researches might have been in the hands of that gentleman, Mr. O. was convinced they would lose their charm in his hands, and should therefore abstain from following them in detail. He persuaded himself, however, that all the inferences from these laws might be reduced to a few points, and disposed of in a few general remarks. As to one, and that by far the greater portion of the statutes cited by the honorable gentleman, they applied exclusively to paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives. Either the purview of each statute, or other statutes found in the same code, and constituting a part of one system, proved these to be the only objects of those laws, and as, in many instances, they applied to white persons equally with others, the argument built upon them proved too much.

Another portion of these statutes affected merely qualifications for electing, or being elected, to office. These also might be laid aside. By the constitution or laws of several States, the political rights of the white citizen are abridged. It is so in Massachusetts; in Virginia, where freeholders only vote; in Mississippi, where a creed (or the want of it) disqualifies a man for office, and where clergymen are not eligible to the Legislature. This species of exclusion is, therefore, no test of the character of citizen. Indeed, some of the instances mentioned by the honorable gentleman might be regarded as exemptions from burdensome duties with more propriety than as restrictions of civic privileges; and persons who are dispensed from obligations to serve in the militia, and on juries, by law, do not generally complain of their condition.

When the laws and quotations, introduced with such profusion by the honorable gentleman, were arranged with reference to these two general heads, they would leave but a small remnant for any other. He did not recollect but one case which would not fall under them, and that was the statute of Massachusetts prohibiting intermarriages between white and colored people. With respect to that law, it was proper to remark, that marriage was a civil contract regulated by the policy of every State, according to its own views of public utility, and subject to greater or less ceremonials and restraints by the sovereign authority. It would not be pretended that laws creating temporary disabilities for matrimonial alliances, requiring age, consent of parents, or forms of marrying, would impair the quality of citizenship. And if the policy of a State might justify one denomination of restrictions upon the marriage contract which did not disfranchise those who became subject to them, why could not the same policy interpose other impediments to marriage without drawing after them disfranchisement as a necessary consequence? Why was a black person disqualified as a citizen by being inhibited from marrying a white person, more than a white person was so under a reverse of the rule? There was no necessary connexion between an incapacity created by law, in one description of persons, to contract marriage with those of another description, and an incapacity of all the rights of a citizen. It was difficult to illustrate this position by supposing examples, without seeming to disparage the unfortunate persons who were the objects of the exclusion. Hardly any other probable case could be imagined, that would call for the establishment of permanent legal distinctions between classes of citizens, in the exercise of the right to form matrimonial connexions, and yet the policy of such a distinction in the state of our society, in this one instance, may be very unquestionable. The free people of color being everywhere a very small minority of individuals, under particular circumstances, are not entitled to complain of special restrictions and exclusions, which the vast majority, by high considerations connected with their ideas of sound policy, and invincible predilections for their own race, and the desire of transmitting to posterity its blood pure and unmixed, and for no other reason, may have seen fit to impose. If leprosy, or any other disease attended with a decidedly hereditary and incurable taint, were known to prevail in a State, laws might be passed to prevent marriage with the infected persons without touching any other rights. He meant, however, only to exemplify, and not to assimilate the cases—this, he repeated, being a peculiar case, and entire sui generis. He had thus far proceeded upon the supposition that all the statutes of the several States adduced upon the occasion, were in themselves Constitutional. But, his second answer to this objection from the State laws was, that if any of them went so far as to disfranchise all free persons of color, such laws were void in themselves. He had heard of none that did go that length. Let us next, said he, advert for a moment to the suggestion of gentlemen, that if the clause of the constitution of Missouri should be found in discordance with that of the United States, a remedy would be found in the judicial department. It was, however, the first time he had ever heard it urged as a sound or safe principle that the rights, or even the claims of any portion of the people might be abandoned by the Legislature, because the courts could do them justice. It was, indeed, curious to observe the fluctuations of opinion relative to the judicial power occasioned by the different circumstances under which it was called forth. There was now upon the table a resolution declaring null and void the sedition act, which had received the sanction of two Congresses and many judicial decisions. In this case of Missouri, however, he insisted that the judiciary could give no adequate relief. The justice here sought was not remedial but preventive—not to restore to an individual violated rights, but to place numbers beforehand in a condition to exercise them. It was to retain (so far as the expression of the opinion of Congress could do it) to all free colored citizens the right of going to Missouri, if they thought fit, and settling therein, and not to redress the injury of one or more individuals who might be driven from its limits. Congress was to settle a principle, not to try a cause—and if the principle was abandoned, no cause would ever be tried. What individual would ever be found to journey through the immeasurable wilderness, “with lingering steps and slow,” and set his foot in Missouri with a certainty of being driven back, for the privilege of having recourse to the courts of the United States, at an expense entirely beyond his compass, and beyond the value of the object of his journey? And if such a person could be found, what is the situation of others who might wish to settle there while the cause is pending? It had, indeed, been often urged, that the Legislature of Missouri might enact laws to the end provided for in their constitution, even if that instrument had been silent. Certainly they might do so, but it was equally certain they might forbear thus to legislate. But, by passing this resolution, and thus giving efficacy to their constitution, you communicate to the State and to its constitution the whole power of the Union for giving effect to this policy, and compel their Legislature to pass laws which they might otherwise omit, or which, if enacted, they might afterwards repeal. The honorable gentleman from Maine had favored the Senate with an exposition of his ideas of the term citizen, as found in the Constitution, which Mr. O. said he was not able to comprehend, but which, if he did understand it, would enable a State to disfranchise all her citizens of all colors and complexions.

He would not pause to consider that doctrine, nor, indeed, to notice all the suggestions of that gentleman. There was, however, one topic unfolded by him to which he would for a moment advert. The gentleman contended that our opposition to the power of the States to exclude persons of color from settlement in their jurisdictions would operate in favor of the slaveholding States sending away their freed blacks into other States, and that the Northern States would be thus overrun with their swarms. He could not believe, however, that the North would realize their obligation to the gentleman for wishing to prevent that quarter of the country from this inconvenience, by shutting up Missouri, which would leave them no other resort but the white peopled States. But further, if a colored man may become a free citizen, he cannot be sent away; and, if not a citizen, other States are not bound to receive him when he is sent away. Mr. O., however, did not admit that the mere manumission of a slave would make him a citizen. This was a very different question from any which he had considered, and it might be far from true that manumission would produce any such effect, and yet every principle advanced by him remains impregnable.

On the whole, he said, he had no ambition to be distinguished as a zealot in the cause of emancipation, or an advocate for a sudden change of condition in that unfortunate class of persons who were held in servitude. Much less was he inclined to adopt any language or measures tending to excite among them a spirit of discontent, or to wound the feelings or rouse the irritation or resentment of their owners. The evil of slavery was too profoundly rooted for him to indicate or even imagine its cure.

No circumstances led him to regret discussions affecting the people of color in the United States more than their unavoidable tendency to elicit observations which might be misunderstood, and aggravate the troubles of slavery by adding discontent and vain hopes of freedom to the number. The actual condition of slaves in the old States was not a subject for the cognizance of Congress. And until those whom it immediately concerned could make some discovery whereby the abolition of slavery could be effected, he feared that the efforts of others, however well intended, would be worse than nugatory. So far was he from wishing it to be understood by the slaves that the people of the North would hold them justified in any violent measures to attempt the attainment of freedom, he was desirous of their realizing, what he believed to be true, that all considerate persons in every section of the Union would unite with one accord with their masters in putting down every species of revolt and insurrection, as pregnant with dreadful calamities to the whole nation. This had ever been his feeling and his language. But, with these convictions, he would strenuously and for ever oppose the extension of slavery, and all measures which should subject a freeman, of whatever color, to the degradation of a slave. Believing, therefore, that every free citizen of color in the Union was joint tenant with himself in the public lands of Missouri, and of the jurisdiction possessed by the United States in that Territory until it should be elsewhere vested; and that, however humble and disadvantageous might be his sphere, he was entitled to his protection equally with those born to a happier destiny, he could not consent to an act which should divest him of his property and rights, and interdict him from even passing into a country of which he was a legitimate co-proprietor with himself.

When Mr. OTIS had concluded—other gentleman might desire to deliver his sentiments on the question, moved an adjournment; and the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, December 11.

Mr. BARBOUR gave notice that, to-morrow, he would ask leave to bring in a bill concerning the collection of the public moneys.

Mr. PINKNEY submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law amending or explaining the judiciary laws in such manner as to authorize, under such restrictions as may be thought proper, the prosecution of writs of error, in criminal cases, from the judgments of the highest court of judicature in a State, in which any question has arisen under the Constitution or laws of the Union, to the Supreme Court of the United States; and that the said committee report by bill or otherwise.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Nicholas Jarrott;" a bill, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the district court in the district of Mississippi;" and a bill, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'an act to alter the times of the session of the circuit and district courts in the District of Columbia;'" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The three last bills brought up for concurrence were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

Mr. HORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was recommitted the bill to incorporate the Columbian Society for literary purposes, reported the same with an amendment.

Mr. HORSEY presented the memorial of Thomas Law and others, citizens of Washington, praying that so much of that portion of the public ground in the city of Washington, known by the name of "Reservation No. 10," as now remains to the public, may be sold on condition of improvement; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Alabama, in behalf of certain petitioners, inhabitants of that State, who are purchasers of public lands, and who, from the great diminution of the circulating medium, and the operation of the law reducing the price of the public lands, are unable to comply with the terms of their purchases, soliciting for said purchasers such relief as to Congress may seem meet; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Robert Purdy; and, on motion of Mr. LLOYD, it was ordered to lie on the table.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the officers and volunteers engaged in the late campaign against the Seminole Indians, together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs, and, having agreed to the amendments, the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the managers of the National Vaccine Institution in the District of Columbia;" and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to continue in force for a further time the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;" and the further consideration thereof was postponed to Thursday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution authorizing Mountjoy Bayly to employ a person to attend the furnace, and no amendment having been proposed thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of John Holmes, and no amendment having been proposed thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate proceeded to consider, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of Morgan Brown, and no amendment having been proposed thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

ADMISSION OF MISSOURI.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the assent of Congress to the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. EATON, of Tennessee, said, before the Senate proceeded to a final vote upon the resolution, he would ask permission again to offer the amendment which had heretofore been submitted, and rejected. This, he believed, was strictly in order. The rejection of the proviso being before the Senate, in Committee of the Whole, did not prevent it from being considered, now that the resolution was reported to the Senate. Mr. E. then offered the following amendment to the resolution :

"Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to give the assent of Congress to any provision in the constitution of Missouri, if any such there be, which contravenes that clause in the Constitution of the United States which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Mr. KING, of New York, said, as the amendment had already been considered, and rejected by the Senate, he regretted that it had been deemed expedient to offer it again. I object now, said Mr. K., as I have done before, to this amendment, because it declares that, in the admission of Missouri, the Senate have not considered, and do not pronounce any opinion, concerning the clause of the Missouri constitution which makes it the duty of the Legislature thereof to pass laws to exclude free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, Missouri. This declaration ought not to be made, because it would exhibit the Senate in this singular situation, (if his construction of the constitution of Missouri was correct,) that, in passing the act of admission, the Senate omits to consider and to allow its due weight to the only provision in that Constitution upon which the obligation to admit, or not admit, Missouri depends. Mr. K. said he considered this proposition of much more importance than the mover of it appeared to do; and he was not willing to decide on it instanter at any rate.

Mr. EATON replied at some length. He said he certainly would be as unwilling as any one to press the consideration of what he had submitted, before gentlemen had fully made up their minds, and were prepared to vote. He doubted not, however, but that upon this subject all were prepared. It would be borne in mind by the Senate that this was not now an original proposition, but one that had before been considered and voted upon. When he had first the honor of submitting it, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KING) had urged his want of preparation, and on an application for postponement by himself, the postponement had been granted. Under this state of things, Mr. E. could not perceive any necessity for further procrastination, more especially when it seemed to be the wish of all to put an end, in some way, to this unpleasant question. Mr. E. said as to the constitutionality of the subject, however other gentlemen might be fully satisfied, yet with him, and with others he believed, the fact was otherwise. He was not willing either to affirm or to deny, that the constitution of Missouri was in strict conformity to the Constitution of the United States; he should have doubts were he to be required affirmatively to vote either way. But of this he did not pretend to doubt that, thus situated, thus doubting, it was his duty to lean to the side of the Constitution, and by his vote to support that instrument which he and every member had sworn to maintain inviolate. The proviso ventured an opinion neither way; it was a protestando in the true signification of the term—the exclusion of a conclusion—a waiver on the part of Congress to give an opinion either one way or the other. This being the object which he wished to attain, he trusted the Senate would excuse his again pressing on their consideration that which had been before acted and voted upon. Encouraged by the information that some gentlemen who had before voted against the proviso had changed their opinions, and were now disposed to vote for it, was with him the inducement for again venturing to offer it. Time had been afforded to think fully on it, and further delay he thought ought not to be requested.

Mr. BARBOUR declined engaging in the debate, not, he said, that he was unwilling to meet the question, but with a hope and under the expectation that the question would be immediately taken.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Ohio, said it was not his wish to detain the Senate; that if he had entertained a wish to engage in the discussion, the present state of his health was such, that he could not express himself so as to be heard by the Senate, nor could he speak at all without great pain. He rose, he said, to state an objection to the constitution of Missouri, which had not been alluded to in the debate on this resolution—an objection of more force, and, in his view, involving principles more important to the interests of the nation, than the provision which had been so much discussed. The eighth article of the constitution of Missouri authorizes the establishment of a bank with a capital not to exceed five millions of dollars, at least one-half of which shall be reserved for the use of the State. Mr. T. said he considered this provision a direct and palpable violation of that part of the tenth section of the Federal Constitution, which provides that "no State shall coin money, emit bills of credit, [or] make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." This important provision of the Federal Constitution, said Mr. T., was intended to guard against evils which might embarrass the Federal Government, and prove destructive to the best interests of the people of the United States. An immaterial change in the form did not change the substance. Whether a bill of credit is signed by an auditor, a treasurer, an officer of a State, or a president of a bank created for that purpose, the evils are the same. The power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures, has been exclusively given to Congress. It was never contemplated or anticipated that these important powers should be rendered nugatory by bank machinery, put in operation either by Federal or State power. Mr. T. said it was also his opinion that banks, as established in the United States, are anti-republican institutions, which tend inevitably to aristocracy.

Mr. SMITH said he would refer the gentleman to the journals of the last session, to show that a resolution admitting Alabama into the Union had passed without opposition, and that the constitution of Alabama contained a provision for the establishment of a bank.

The Senate then divided on the amendment, and there rose in its favor twenty-three members, and it was agreed to.

The question then being on ordering the resolution to a third reading, as amended—

Mr. MORRIL, of New Hampshire, arose and thus addressed the Senate:

Mr. President: It cannot be said by the honorable Senate that I am in the practice of consuming much of their time in debate, or of frequently asking their attention to my remarks. When the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) immediately after this resolution was reported by your committee, intimated a wish that the question might be taken sub silentio, I was gratified with the hope that the unpleasant subject would pass off in that way. But as several gentlemen have occupied your attention, and have presented an unexpected view of the subject, I am inclined to offer my opinion also. In doing this, I am not influenced from an anxiety to make a speech before the Senate, nor from the pride of having the event announced in the public papers simply for the perusal of my constituents. I would assure the Senate I am not stimulated either by pleasure or ambition on this occasion; neither will my remarks arise from any peculiar hostility to the admission of Missouri into this Union, on such principles, and with such a constitution, as coincide with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. I disclaim sinister motives and sectional partialities on this subject, and declare myself actuated by more noble and important views; and, solemnly impelled by a sense of duty I owe to my constituents and my country, I will endeavor to divest myself of preconceived opinions on the subject of slavery, and avoid any expression which may tend to revive those unpleasant sensations which so evidently prevailed in this body during the last session, and through the country, and examine the subject as involving a great Constitutional question. The inquiry is not, in this case, whether slavery shall exist or be tolerated in Missouri. I am ready to admit, for the moment, that this has been so far settled by the vote of the last session as not to come into the present debate; but the passing of the resolution recognises a principle materially affecting the rights of other States and the privileges of their citizens. This principle, and the consequences of admitting it, will be the subject of my remarks.

Sir, I must be permitted to state that this debate is not courted by Congress; it is from imperious necessity that any are compelled to protest against the adoption of the resolution; to save the Constitution of the nation inviolate, and preserve harmony and union.

To present my view more fully on this subject, it may be useful to recur to the objects of the Confederation. These I discover, in part, in the preamble of the Constitution:

"We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

"Union, justice, domestic tranquillity, common defence, general welfare, and the blessings of liberty secured to posterity," were the grand and primary objects in establishing this Constitution, under which, and for these purposes, the Government was organized. The guardianship and protection of this, the charter of our rights, is now committed to the people and their representatives in Congress. It is, then, our duty, with vigilance and a watchful eye, to mark the progress of events, and arrest, at the threshold, the unhallowed hand which may be raised to pervert its meaning, misuse its provisions, or tarnish its glory. After reflecting upon the solemn obligations which devolve upon the members of this body, to examine with solicitude the principles and provisions of the Constitution, and faithfully and impartially apply them to the existing circumstances of the country, it would not seem strange if a peculiar anxiety were manifest on their application to a case pregnant with doubts and fearful apprehensions.

Sir, the first thing when I entered this chamber, to become a member of the Senate, was, to approach your chair, and take a solemn oath to support the Constitution. This I consider more than a mere formality—an obligation by which I am bound, in my own conscience, to guard with vigilance the general and particular rights guaranteed by that instrument to this privileged nation. It is not necessary to refer you to the toils and privations of past periods to show their value. A moment's reflection upon the time that Sir Walter Raleigh visited the banks of the Roanoke; Captain Smith explored the Eastern shore from Penobscot to Cape Cod, or our ancestors landed upon the Rock of Plymouth, with some of the succeeding events, will furnish the mind with evidence of the estimate we ought to put upon the Constitution, and the blessings it secures to our country. Forty years successful experience of the enjoyment of equal rights, under a free Government, demonstrate the advantages of republican institutions. But, sir, I waive all other considerations, and proceed to examine one point which attracts our attention and merits particular notice.

Is there any paragraph in the constitution of Missouri which contravenes any provision in the Constitution of the United States? This will be a subject of inquiry.

We find in the Constitution of Missouri that, "it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in this State, under any pretext whatsoever. No comment upon this can be necessary to render its meaning perfectly intelligible.

This will lead me to inquire into the duty and power of Congress, and then recur to this provision again.

"The United States, in Congress assembled, shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of Government, and protect each of them against invasion." This is necessary, to "insure domestic tranquillity, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

It is the duty of Congress to see "that full faith and credit are given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State." This is essential "to perfect the Union, establish justice," cement the bonds of harmony, and secure the rights and privileges of the existing States.

By this, a mutual friendship would be encouraged, a unity of sentiment extended, and a confidence in the whole concentrated.

Congress have power to receive new States into the Confederacy. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." In doing this, they are bound to see that the rights and privileges of the individual States are not infringed. They are not only expected to secure inviolate the rights of States, but "the privileges and immunities" of their citizens. Among these, the following is a very essential one. "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Sir, by this I understand that a citizen in any State in the Union may pass into any other State in the Union, and there enjoy "all the privileges and immunities of citizens" in the State to which he removes.

The same principle I find engrafted in the Articles of Confederation; by having recourse to that I find my exposition confirmed, and the same sentiment more fully and particularly expressed.

"The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions, as the inhabitants thereof respectively."

The express language of this section so perfectly coincides with the opinion I have ventured to advance, that a comment could add nothing to its perspicuity. Could the term citizen need exposition, I would offer one, which, however, I could scarcely have imagined, had it not been for the novel and fallacious remarks of the honorable gentleman from Maine (Mr. HOLMES.) In the foregoing extract we find the terms "inhabitants, citizens, and people," used as synonymous.

These are perfectly well understood in our community, and, I will only add, take from the inhabitants slaves and aliens, and the remainder are citizens.

Color does not come into the consideration, and it has no share in characterizing an inhabitant or a citizen. On this exposition I shall rest my argument.

I will now pass to inquire what are the provisions of the Constitution of the United States respecting the powers of the several States. These are all uniform and equal. They have certain powers, and are prohibited certain acts.

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof;" and, when vacancies occur, the State authority may fill them. But "no State shall enter into any treaty, alliance, or confederation; coin money, or make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts; or grant any title of nobility; or keep troops or ships of war in time of peace."

The reason is, by agreement, it is prohibited in the Constitution, and in the same manner by agreement, it is provided, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" and they "shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of the inhabitants thereof, subject to no other restriction than they respectively" endure.

As I before observed, I must now, for the purpose of comparison, recur to the provision of the constitution of Missouri, which makes it the duty of "the General Assembly to pass laws to prevent 'free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever.'"

Believing it fully demonstrated, that free persons of color are citizens, and conceiving it equally clear that some States in the Union have citizens of this description, and that the Constitution of the United States secures to all the citizens in all the States the unmolested liberty of migrating to any State in the Union, and there to enjoy unrestrained, the "privileges and immunities" of the citizens of that State, I ask, is this restrictive clause in the constitution of Missouri compatible with the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States?

I distinctly answer the question. Sir, it is not. But, say gentlemen, "we must not examine this subject;" there may be difficulties, and there may not be. If there should be any, submit them to the Judiciary.

Sir, I do not accede to this doctrine. Congress have the power to examine, and I shall venture to exercise it. "New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." How? By guess, or by lot, without knowledge or reflection; or by examination and legislation? "The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." How are the republican features of the Constitution to be ascertained but by examination? It can be done neither by weight nor by measure.

I would seriously ask, for what purpose was the constitution of Missouri presented to Congress? We are led to presume, for examination and approbation, as this has been the general practice from the organization of the Government to the present time.

If this were not the case, why did not the convention of Missouri inform Congress by letter, or its delegate, they had made a constitution, and must now be admitted into the Union? Surely this would have been a very summary and novel course, but no more exceptionable than to offer a constitution without admitting the liberty of examining it.

The condition of Vermont was materially different from that of any other State. In consequence of difficulties subsisting between her and New York, respecting territorial limits, her constitution was formed, and her government organized, some years previous to her admission into the Union. But on her application by commissioners, she was admitted by an act of Congress, approved February 18, 1791. "The State of Vermont having petitioned the Congress to be admitted a member of the United States, Be it enacted, &c., That, on the 4th day of March, 1791, the said State, by the name and style of 'the State of Vermont,' shall be received and admitted into this Union, as a new and entire member of the United States of America."

The district of Kentucky, being originally a part of Virginia, applied to that Commonwealth for permission to form herself into a new State, and petitioned Congress for admission into the Union; whereupon an act passed for that purpose. "Whereas the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Virginia, by an act entitled, &c., have consented that the district of Kentucky, &c., should be formed into a new State; and whereas a convention of delegates, &c., have petitioned Congress to consent, &c., that the said district should be formed into a new State, and be received into the Union, by the name of 'the State of Kentucky'—Be it enacted, &c., That the Congress doth consent that the said district of Kentucky, &c., shall, upon the first day of June, 1792, be formed into a new State; and, upon the aforesaid first day of June, 1792, the said new State, by the name and style of the State of Kentucky, shall be received and admitted into this Union, as a new and entire member of the United States of America."

Thus we see the formality which has been observed in admitting new States into the Union. In no instance has this diminished, but in all instances it has increased. We will pass the admission of all intermediate States, and come to that of Louisiana, which is directly in point. The Territory of Orleans applied for admission into the Union, and Congress passed an act authorizing them to call a convention and form a constitution, enumerating certain conditions upon which she should be received; among which were the following: "That, in case the convention shall declare its assent, in behalf of the people of the said territory, to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and shall form a constitution and State government for the people of the said territory, the said convention is hereby required to cause to be transmitted to Congress the instrument by which its assent to the Constitution of the United States is thus given and declared; and also a true and attested copy of such constitution as shall be formed by said convention; and, if the same shall not be disapproved by Congress at their next session, the said State shall be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States."

Here we distinctly see that Congress required, previous to her admission, and as pre-requisites, that the convention should declare its assent to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and transmit the instrument of their assent to them; and, also, an attested copy of their constitution, "and, if the same should not be disapproved by Congress," they should be admitted.

With respect to Missouri the law says, Section 7, "And be it further enacted, That, in case a constitution and State government shall be formed for the people of the said Territory of Missouri, the said convention, or representatives, as soon as may be, shall cause a true and attested copy of such constitution or frame of State government, as shall be formed or provided, to be transmitted to Congress."

Here, then, we learn Congress prescribed conditions; required the constitution to be presented; reserved the privilege of examination, and the power of approving or disapproving. For this I contend; and these remarks are made to show the propriety and reasonableness of my claim. This privilege has been claimed, and this power has been exercised by an authority no more competent than that of the present Congress.

But, say gentlemen, you must not examine into this subject, but turn it over to the judiciary.

Sir, I choose to examine for myself. This being my right, I conceive a different course needless and improper. Needless, because Congress have the power and ability. This is delegated to this department of the Government; in the first instance, by the Constitution; and Congress have no right to surrender it. "New States may be admitted by the Congress," and no other body.

It is improper, because it would perplex a certain class of proprietors. Apply this to the poor yellow man who owns land in Missouri. They pass a law prohibiting free negroes and mulattoes from settling "in the State, under any pretext whatsoever." This is in force till nullified by the judiciary, which cannot be effected without an action at law. Is he able to endure this excessive burden? Who would undertake it to get into Missouri? The barrier is equal to an armed force, extending around the whole territory of the State. It would keep any citizen in the Union out, and this was the design of it. Surely, if they were to say, (which they could with equal propriety,) that no citizen with a gray head should settle in Missouri, I would never make the attempt. Hence, then, this provision in the constitution of Missouri is in direct hostility to the Constitution of the United States.

This, sir, is distinctly admitted in the report of the committee of the House, to whom the constitution was referred. They say, "the committee are not unaware that a part of the 26th section of the 3d article of the constitution of Missouri, by which the legislature of that State has been directed to pass laws 'to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, the State,' has been construed to apply to such of that class as are citizens of the United States; and that their exclusion has been deemed repugnant to the Federal Constitution." Here the fact for which we contend is conceded; and, also, that there are some "of that class who are citizens of the United States." If this is not the case, why your provisos? Why submit nothing to the judiciary? Why must there be a protestando introduced?

Mr. President, I proceed to show the consequences of this provision.

Some States have free citizens of color. This is the case in Vermont, New Hampshire, and Massachusetts. In Vermont, there is a mulatto man by the name of Haines, who is a regular ordained minister in Rutland. He is pastor of a church and society of white people; has frequently been moderator of the Theological Association to which he belongs, and also of ecclesiastical councils convened for the ordination of ministers. In fact, his abilities, education, moral character, and standing in society, are such that he has received an honorary degree of Master of Arts from the University. But this man and his family, although of high standing in community, and possessing all the faculties of citizens, are proscribed, and, by the constitution of Missouri, are prohibited settling in the State.

In New Hampshire, there was a yellow man by the name of Chcswell, who, with his family, were respectable in point of abilities, property, and character. He held some of the first offices in the town in which he resided, was appointed justice of the peace for that county, and was perfectly competent to perform with ability all the duties of his various offices in the most prompt, accurate, and acceptable manner. But, this family are forbidden to enter and live in Missouri.

In Boston, is a mulatto man by the name of Thomas Paul, a regularly ordained Baptist Minister, pastor of a church of people of color, at whose meeting many white people attend, and who preaches by exchange or otherwise, with all the neighboring ministers of his denomination.

Sir, you not only exclude these citizens from their Constitutional "privileges and immunities," but also your soldiers of color, to whom you have given patents for land. You had a company of this description. They have fought your battles; they have defended your country; they have preserved your privileges, but have lost their own. What did you say to them on their enlistment? We will give you a monthly compensation, and at the close of the year, 160 acres of good land, on which you may settle, and, by cultivating the soil, spend your declining years in peace, and in the enjoyment of those immunities for which you have fought and bled. Now, sir, you restrict them, and will not suffer them to enjoy the fruit of their labor. Where is the public faith in this case? Did they suppose, with a patent in their hand, declaring their title to land in Missouri, with the seal of the nation and President's signature affixed thereto, it would be said to them, by any authority, you shall not possess the premises? This could never have been anticipated.

But, says the honorable gentleman from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) "they are perfectly secured by a saving clause in the constitution of Missouri," which must be taken in connexion with that part which prohibits their settling in the State. It must, therefore, be read: "it shall be the duty of the General Assembly to pass laws, to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in this State, under any pretext whatsoever: Provided, however, The General Assembly shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States, nor with any regulation Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers." My humble opinion is, this does not reach the case. Were it to protect patentees of the Government, this would be only a part of that class of citizens who are liable to suffer. But the fact is, it will not do that. The law says, a mulatto man shall not settle in Missouri "under any pretext whatsoever." This provision says, "the Assembly shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil." What has this to do with his settling in that State? It will afford him no relief. But "the Assembly shall not interfere with any regulation Congress may find it necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers." What security will this afford to the yellow man desirous of settling in Missouri? They will not destroy his title, but they will not permit him to come into the State. The gentleman's argument goes upon the ground, that a title and possession are the same. This I do not admit. It is a principle laid down in the books, that one person may hold the title and another the possession; and this is proved from daily experience. If this were not the case, what gives origin to a writ of ejectment? It grows out of the very circumstance that one person may hold the title and another the possession; and the title may be good, but possession cannot be obtained without an action at law. The quality of the title in this case may be inferred from the fact, that, although the yellow man may not enter and possess the premises, he can transfer his title to a white citizen, who may, without molestation, enter and enjoy the premises.

Then, on a critical examination of the Constitution, we find no relief, but are compelled to yield to the fact, that free citizens of some States are precluded the privilege of settling in Missouri; by which their rights are abridged, contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, can we suffer one, even the meanest of our citizens, to be unconstitutionally deprived of his privileges? No. We are the guardians of his rights, and, in the performance of our duty, we cannot permit them to be infringed.

How was it with Mr. Meade, who was unjustly retained in prison in Spain? He was deprived of his liberties and immunities. Congress took notice of the circumstance, and that very justly. Executive interference was exercised, and his liberty was regained. This manifested a suitable regard to the rights of our citizens. When our citizens are taken and retained by the Algerines, you retake or negotiate and redeem them. In this case you make no distinction between the white man and negro—they are both redeemed with your money. When Commodore O'Brien was consul at Algiers, there were six negroes redeemed at the same price as white men; and one slave, who was restored to his owner, but not made free. When your soldiers are captured, black or white, you redeem them. It is proper that you should. These are only the infringement of other rights, than those abridged by the constitution of Missouri. The question is not what privileges may be violated, nor how many, nor to what degree, nor whether the citizen be black or white; but can we tamely suffer one State to deprive any citizen of any of his Constitutional rights and privileges?

If Missouri can do this, why not keep a standing army, enter into a treaty, coin money, and grant titles of nobility? She is a frontier State—the Indians are near; it may be very convenient to keep an army or make a treaty. The reason is, the Constitution of the United States distinctly says she shall not. And in the other case it expressly declares, "the citizens of each State shall be en'titled to all the privileges and immunities of the citizens of Missouri; and they shall have as free ingress and regress as her own citizens now have." This is the only consistent construction that can be given to the Constitution of the United States, and the only safe principle which can be adopted to secure the provisions of the Constitution from infractions, and the rights and privileges of the citizens of the several States from the most destructive violation. Admit the contrary principle, and each State becomes a monarchy, or is transformed to despotism. Our dearest privileges are wrested from our hands; and those very rights by which our national union, domestic tranquillity, and general welfare are secured, are forever annihilated. If you can proscribe one class of citizens, you may another. Color no more comes into consideration to decide who is a citizen than size or profession. You may as well say a tall citizen shall not settle in Missouri, as a yellow citizen shall not. If one State can do this all may. The consequence will be, that size, profession, age, shape, color, or any disgusting quality in a citizen, would be a sufficient reason why he should be precluded settling in any State, which, from its pride, caprice, or vanity, are disposed to keep him out. Sir, under such a state of things, where are our liberties and privileges? They are fled. They are absorbed in the caprice of a State. Where is your "free ingress and regress from State to State?" Your national existence is lost; the Union is destroyed; the objects of confederation annihilated, and your political fabric demolished.

Sir, I have endeavored to point out the objects of the American confederacy; the duty and power of Congress; the duty, power, and privileges of States; who are citizens of some States, and the rights of our citizens, and the provisions of the Constitution of the United States, by which those rights are secured, and the provisions of the constitution of Missouri; and have come to this irresistible conclusion, that the Constitution of the United States secures to the citizens of all the States in the Union, "the privileges and immunities of the citizens" of each State in the Union; but Missouri, in her constitution, precludes certain citizens, in certain States, the "privileges and immunities" of her own citizens; therefore, the constitution of Missouri contravenes the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States. For these reasons I vote against the resolution.

Sir, a few more words, and I close my argument. I regret that I feel compelled to offer an opinion of the complexion of this business. I lament that it has the appearance of defiance. I have endeavored to put the most favorable construction possible upon it, and it amounts to a challenge. Oppose us if you dare! I am driven to this result from knowledge and reflection. On examining this constitution, I am sure it was not penned by uninformed men. Aside from a few exceptionable parts, it is one of the best constitutions I have ever seen. The Convention were not unapprized of the feelings excited last session. The particular exceptionable clause was not in the original draught. They were informed by their honorable Delegate, and one of the gentlemen who appears here as a Senator, that this paragraph would be objectionable. But it is here, not inadvertently nor from necessity. If they had intended to pass a law similar to that directed by this paragraph in the constitution, they could have done it without this provision.

Mr. President: Before I take my seat, I must be permitted to make a few strictures upon some remarks which fell from the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH.) He observed that "negroes and mulattoes are not citizens of the United States." It is not my intention to consume your time to demonstrate the contrary of this; because it would not, in the least degree, vary the subject. Our inquiry is, and it is the point which settles the question, are they citizens of any particular State? This point I have proved, and on the other hand it is admitted; and if they are citizens of any one State in the Union, this is enough for our purpose. I would ask my friend, what is the man in his country who is neither a slave nor an alien? In mine he is a citizen. The gentleman argued largely to show "that slavery was tolerated in Republics." He need not have gone to Rome, Greece, nor Sparta, to have proved this; it is evident from our daily observation, and, of course, admitted. But what is this to the point in debate? What has this to do with the question whether Missouri has a Constitutional right to prohibit free citizens from settling in her Territory? Does it follow, because slavery is tolerated in Republics, therefore Missouri may proscribe free citizens? This reasoning is neither conclusive nor convincing.

The gentleman says: "Missouri is now a State to all intents and purposes." This is not admitted. What has made her a State? What is the language of your resolution? Not that she now is, but that she shall be, a State, when this resolution is passed by both Houses, and approved by the President.

"Be it resolved, &c., that the State of Missouri shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the 'United States of America.'" But, were it true that she is a State, there is nothing gained by it. Vermont was a State a long time before she was received into the Union. The question is, shall Missouri be admitted with a constitution which conflicts with the Constitution of the United States?

My friend argues, "we are bound by the Treaty of Cession to receive her." Admit this. But in that treaty there are terms and conditions. "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution." Hence, in her admission, the principles of the Federal Constitution must be observed and maintained inviolate. This was the ground on which Louisiana was received, and Missouri being a part of the same purchase, she must be admitted on the same principles, and in the same way, and no other.

But the gentleman says, "States were admitted

DECEMBER, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

SENATE.

without presenting their constitution." This may have been the case. Circumstances have been different, especially with Vermont; and the manner of this transaction less formal and correct than at the present time. Because another State has been received, which did not present her constitution, does it follow that Congress must not examine the constitution of Missouri? It matters not in this case what has been done; the constitution is here presented to Congress. "But you have no power to control a constitution." For what purpose, then, is it sent here. To lie on our table? Congress had power to control the constitution of Louisiana. Have they less power than they then had? In this case they said to the Convention, send a true and attested copy of your constitution here, and if the same shall not be disapproved by Congress at their next session, the said State shall be admitted into the Union. This is all the power for which we contend; and this is a privilege which Congress has had, and still has, a right to exercise.

"Louisiana, Ohio, and other States, declare how persons coming into them shall obtain a residence." This we readily admit; and against such regulation have no objection. But does it follow, because certain States prescribe conditions on which emigrants shall gain a residence, therefore Missouri has a Constitutional right to prohibit the citizens of other States from settling in her territory? Really I do not see the force of the argument.

"States have made a distinction between white people and blacks." This is very true; so they have between white people. South Carolina has distinguished that gentleman in giving him a seat here, and that very justly; and he has nobly distinguished himself. And what is this to the point? "But in the Eastern States, they whip black people—not only once and twice, but ten times, and every ten days." This may be true; and equally true, that they whip white people when they violate their laws; and continue to whip, black or white, as long as they continue to violate wholesome laws; and I suspect will persevere in the practice until they reform or emigrate to South Carolina, where they may receive better treatment. Does this prove any thing with respect to the constitutional power of Missouri?

But, says the gentleman, "New Hampshire excludes negroes from training." This is very true; and so they excuse many white people. This only places them among the exempt; generally, the first class in society. And from this very circumstance, they have the privilege of walking about with the other gentlemen and seeing the soldiers train. It neither deprives them or any other person of citizenship or any other privilege.

Blacks, then, are not degraded in New Hampshire. Custom has made a distinction between them and other men; but the Constitution and laws make none.

Mr. President, a few words in reply to what has fallen from the gentleman from Maine, (Mr. HOLMES,) and I shall have done. He observed, purchasers under the United States are not restricted. To maintain this position, he took occasion to explain the Constitution of the United States, and that of Missouri, the incorrectness of which will more fully appear in his after remarks, in the application of the principle. As my former argument had a particular allusion to these opinions, any further refutation is unnecessary.

This gentleman says, "the doctrine that free blacks have a right to enter free States, is dangerous." I am a little surprised to hear a gentleman of so much acuteness in disquisition upon Constitutional law, calculating upon consequences which have no immediate connexion with the subject. He might as well argue, that a commercial enterprise to the Euxine sea, would be detrimental to Massachusetts, and therefore Missouri must keep all free citizens of color out of her territory, as to argue that if free blacks may enter any free State, Maine will be infested with them; and therefore, Missouri must prohibit their settling in that State.

"A State may exclude any person." Here we are at issue. I by no means admit the doctrine. Any State may regulate the terms upon which emigrants shall become residents; but no State has any right to exclude them. To utterly prohibit, and regulate by law the terms of inhabitaney, are materially and essentially different; and one within the municipal power of every State, the other expressly prohibited by the Constitution of the United States.

But, says the gentleman, "the Constitution means, when they get in, they shall have privileges, but they may be kept out." This is a little curious, for a gentleman learned in the law. Then, if a person were to ascend in an air balloon, at a small distance from the line of Missouri, and safely land within her territory, the constitution secures to him "privileges and immunities;" but it makes no provision for his crossing the line by land. Under this exposition, where is the "free ingress and regress" of the citizens of each State guarantied by the Constitution? Sir, your constitution is like a nose of wax. Your liberties and privileges are a bubble. Your union, domestic tranquillity, and prospect of common defence, are prostrated to the ground. But, says the gentleman, this doctrine is certainly correct, and to test his principle, he adds, "send a mulatto man here, should we not feel our rights invaded? This has no connexion with the question. It is possible some gentleman might feel his rights invaded. But I would inquire, in my turn, what rights are invaded? And I would seriously ask the Senate, if any State in the Union were duly to elect a yellow man Constitutionally qualified, commission and send him here with his credentials, you can exclude him a seat? You have a right to decide on the qualifications of your members; but color is no more a qualification than height, profession, or nation. The gentleman observes, "a mulatto, though a citizen in one State, going into Missouri, has no other rights than a mulatto has in Missouri." Here we are at issue again. This doctrine I flatly deny. The salubrious air and fertile soil of Missouri can never metamorphose a free citizen into a slave; neither can the constitution and law of Missouri do it. Were the proposition true, then a black or yellow free citizen of Maine, going into Virginia, would be a slave. As I before intimated, it is citizen only, and not color, that comes into consideration, in deciding this question.

But the gentleman, in a very affecting tone, enlists all our sympathies, in view of the consequences of rejecting this unconstitutional instrument from Missouri. For these, sir, I conceive Congress is not accountable; and, therefore, such imaginary phantoms are not proper subjects of discussion, nor suitable beacons to direct our course. Missouri was permitted, under a law of Congress, to form a constitution, "republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States," and "transmit an attested copy of such constitution to Congress." It was expected she would perform this in good faith. If she has utterly failed—formed and presented a constitution repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and unpleasant consequences result, the fault is her own. There can be no provision in the constitution of Missouri inadvertently introduced; of course, all the consequences rest upon Missouri. These, however, are not to come into our consideration; the Constitution of the United States alone is to direct our course.

But the gentleman discovers another difficulty, in case this constitution is rejected: he is unable to determine in what condition Missouri will be, whether Territory, or State, or neither. With respect to this, sir, I have only to observe, if that gentleman cannot divine, I presume it is within the scope of Congress, and merely that circumstance would not convince me the object is unattainable.

I would also add, that every difficulty of this kind which could possibly have arisen might have been avoided by precautions similar to those observed by Maine. She, in the first place, petitioned the Legislature of Massachusetts for leave to form a constitution and independent State. This was granted. She then formed her constitution, and fixed her election for State officers after the probable time of the adjournment of the then next session of Congress. She presented her constitution for the approbation of Congress and admission into the Union. This was done. After she became, by an act of Congress, a State in the Union, she elected her officers, and organized her government. If Missouri had pursued the same moderate and consistent course, there could have been no possible difficulty with respect to her character or condition.

Mr. President, these being my views of the subject, I close my remarks, after presenting my thanks to the honorable Senate for the great candor and attention with which they have indulged me while I have occupied their time.

Mr. MACON followed the above speech with a motion to recommit the resolution to the select committee which reported it, with instructions to strike out the proviso adopted to-day on the motion of Mr. EATON. Mr. M. had no doubt whatever of the propriety of the naked resolution as reported, and was opposed to the proviso; he therefore proposed this mode of getting rid of it.

The question on recommitting the resolution was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burrill, Dickerson, King of New York, Lanman, Lowrie, Macon, Mills, Morrill, Noble, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Tichenor, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson—17.

The question was then taken on ordering the resolution, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time, and was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

TUESDAY, December 12.

Mr. THOMAS presented the memorial of the register of the land office and receiver of public moneys at Shawneetown, praying compensation for extra services rendered in the execution of the act "granting the right of pre-emption in the purchase of lands to certain settlers in the Illinois Territory," and of the acts concerning Shawneetown; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. WILSON, of New Jersey, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what provisions are necessary or proper to be made by law to meet contingencies which may arise from unlawful, disputed, or doubtful votes under that part of the 12th article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States, which relates to counting the votes of the Electors for the President and Vice President of the United States.

Mr. WILSON said, it would be found, on referring to the article in the Constitution alluded to in this resolution, that the provision in relation to counting the votes for President and Vice President is very general. The words are, "the President of the Senate shall, in presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the certificates, and the votes shall then be counted." It is not said who shall count the votes, nor who shall decide what votes shall be counted. In consequence of this defect, as the Senate would well remember, some difficulty occurred four years ago, in relation to the votes from Indiana. Objections were made to receiving these votes; the counting was interrupted; the two Houses separated; and although on that occasion they again came together, and proceeded on, and completed the business before them, so happy a result might not always be produced. Cases might occur where stronger doubts might exist, or more excitement prevail; debates be protracted, and decisions deferred, and serious inconveniences or evils follow. Was it not probable such a case would occur during the present session? Would it not at least be prudent to guard against danger from such a contingency? Congress has unquestionably the power, under the last clause of the 8th section of the first article of the Constitution, and he thought they ought to exercise it, by vesting the authority to decide upon doubtful, disputed, or unlawful votes, either in the President of the Senate, the Senate itself, the House of Representatives, or in the two Houses, conjointly or separately. At least, Mr. W. deemed the subject of sufficient importance to justify the inquiry proposed in the resolution which he had submitted.

Mr. WILSON submitted also the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary and proper to be made to the act, entitled "An act relative to the election of a President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President, in case of vacancies in the offices both of the President and Vice President," passed March 1, 1792.

Both resolutions lie on the table one day of course.

ADMISSION OF MISSOURI.

The resolution declaring the consent of Congress to the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union was read a third time, and the question stated "Shall the resolution pass?"

Mr. TRIMBLE observed, in reference to some remarks between himself and Mr. SMITH yesterday, that he had not voted for the admission of Alabama, because he could not reconcile the provision in relation to banks, (with all the checks and guards which had been introduced into the constitution of Alabama on that subject,) with the Federal Constitution. In relation to that provision he had entertained doubts which were at the time expressed to some of his friends. Mr. T. said it was true that he had not made a formal opposition to the admission of Alabama, because he had just taken his seat in the Senate, and was unaccustomed to legislative proceedings; nor did he then suppose that it was so important that he should record his name, in opposition to the measures which he thought violated the spirit and true meaning of the Federal Constitution. But, had the gentleman, said Mr. T., no other defence to set up for that article of the constitution of Missouri? If, said he, the Federal Constitution has been violated, in one instance, is that any reason that it should be violated in another? Can precedent sanctify a violation of the Constitution which we are sworn to support?

The question being then put, the resolution was passed and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

OTIS, HOLMES, and DANA favored the bill. After an unsuccessful motion by Mr. ROBERTS, to postpone the bill indefinitely, it was ordered to a third reading by a large majority.

Mr. LANMAN moved that the bill be read a third time to-day, inasmuch as the term to be suspended would commence on Monday next, and the bill therefore would be ineffectual unless passed promptly.

requiring an unanimous consent to a third reading to-day.

MISSOURI.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to report a bill extending the judicial authority of the United States over the State of Missouri.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. WILLIAMS said it was highly important that the judicial authority of the United States should be extended over Missouri, with the least possible delay. The Territorial courts no longer existed in that Territory, having been superseded by the courts of the State. The State courts had no jurisdiction of offences committed against the United States. Several Indian tribes, said Mr. W., live within the limits of Missouri; our treaty stipulations, and the laws regulating intercourse with the Indian tribes, prohibit intrusion on their territory, and subject the intruders to criminal prosecution. This is an offence of almost daily occurrence, and none but a federal court can try such offences. If, in the Indian country, a white man should kill a red one, the federal court alone can take cognizance of the offence. In answer to such a complaint, it would be but a poor apology to say we had provided no court to try the cause. The Indians would not understand this excuse, and it would lead to retaliation, and perhaps to an Indian war. It is essential, therefore, said Mr. W., to enable us to execute in good faith our engagements with the aborigines of the country, that federal courts should be organized in Missouri. We have other and perhaps more important interests in that country, which alone can be protected by the extension of the judicial authority of the Union. If, said he, the mail should be robbed, or the public funds purloined, the offender at this moment would go without punishment, although there was abundant proof to establish his guilt. Nay, if treason should be committed, the traitors would escape with impunity, for the want of a court to take cognizance of such crimes. In whatever point of view this subject is considered, said Mr. W., it is important that no time should be lost in establishing the federal authority in that State.

The resolution, by the rules of the Senate, lies on the table one day, of course.

WORTHINGTON COLLEGE.

The Senate took up the report of the Committee of Public Lands unfavorable to the petition of the trustees of Worthington College, in Ohio, who pray for a grant of the public lands in their vicinity for the benefit of the college.

Mr. RUGGLES said, as he had been charged with the care of the petition of the trustees of Worthington College, he could not consent to let the report of the committee pass without making some opposition to it. He regretted that the committee had not taken a different view of the subject, and recommended a resolution favorable to the prayer of the petitioners. Mr. R. said he did not propose now to go at large into the subject, but he would state succinctly to the Senate the grounds upon which he meant to rely in opposing this report, and conclude with a motion to postpone the further consideration of the report until Friday. The Committee on Public Lands, in their report, had recapitulated the reasons and arguments used in the petition, which is some evidence that they do not consider them without foundation. Mr. R. said he did not understand the committee as making a decision directly against the claim of the petitioners; the report merely states "that the committee have not been able to discover any thing in this case which gives the petitioners any stronger claim to the bounty of Government than other respectable seminaries of learning." If there was an objection to designating any particular seminary, Mr. R. said, he would not object to have the resolution so modified as to have the grant made to the State, for the use of such institutions as the Legislature thereof might think proper to apply it to. Mr. R. said, as it might possibly be contended that the State of Ohio has had her share of the public lands for the purposes of education, he would state the facts as they existed. No grant of any townships of land has been made to the State of Ohio since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. All the other States which have been admitted into the Union have received two townships. Under the old Confederation, Congress made a private contract with the Ohio Company for the sale of a tract of land in the Northwestern Territory; and, as an inducement for said company to comply with their propositions, Congress offered number sixteen in each township, for the support of schools, number twenty-nine for the purposes of religion, and two townships of land for the support of a college, which was to be established in the centre of the tract. The resolutions of Congress, the contract made under them, and the deed of conveyance which grants the two townships for the use of the company and their associates, all go to show that it was a mere private transaction, and that it was not intended for the State at large. The contract with John Cleves Symmes rests upon the same principles, and must receive the same construction. It therefore appears that Ohio has never received, as a State, the same advantages in this respect as the other new States which have been admitted into the Union. Mr. R. said he would say no more at present, but move that the further consideration of the report be postponed until Friday next.

Mr. R.'s motion was agreed to, and the report postponed accordingly.

SENATE.

Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a copy of the report of the land commissioners at St. Helena, dated 18th November, 1820, with lists of claims and a list of settlers; and the letter and report were read.

Mr. EATON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate any information he may have as to the power and authority which belonged to Don John Beneventure Morales, and to the Baron Carondelet, to grant and dispose of the lands of Spain in Louisiana, previously to the year 1803.

COLUMBIAN SOCIETY.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to incorporate the Columbian Society for Literary purposes; on which there arose a debate of some length, in the course of which Messrs. KING, of New York, and ORIS, explained their objections to the bill, on the ground that it proposed the incorporation of an institution, one of the objects of which was the cultivation of the tenets of a particular sect; that, at any rate, the means and whole object of the institution had not been properly developed; that the capacity of its founders for establishing a college on a proper basis was not known; that the disposition of the people of the District of Columbia towards the establishment of such an University was not known, &c.

To these objections Messrs. BARBOUR, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and MONRIE, replied, that these objections were not founded on the provisions of the bill, but on supposed features not to be found in it; that the bill had nothing of a religious character about it; that, if it could be made more clear on that point, they wished it might be so by any amendment which could be proposed to the bill; that persons of every religious denomination were subscribers to the fund for establishing the institution; that it was no reason, moreover, against the institution that its establishment was undertaken by religious persons; that, though there was no petition before the House, there were all the facts that the Senate could wish, &c.

The bill was postponed to Monday next.

THURSDAY, January 4.

Johnson, for the purpose of erecting a mill thereon; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NOBLE presented two petitions, signed by a number of individuals, concerned directly or indirectly in the purchase of public lands prior to the law "making further provision for the sale of the public lands," stating that said law operates injuriously on them, and praying that they may be permitted to apply the payments already made to such portions of their entries as such payments will cover at two dollars per acre, and that the residue may revert to the United States; and the petitions were read, and laid on the table.

OHIO AND ERIE CANAL.

The Senate took up the bill to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out a canal from Lake Erie to the navigable waters of the Ohio river.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Ohio, submitted his views in support of the bill, referring to the general advantages of improved internal intercourse; the necessity of a canal through the country contemplated, for the convenience of the people; the great advantages which would thereby accrue to the United States, by enhancing the value of the public lands in that quarter, &c.; to show the expediency of at least authorizing the course or line of a canal to be laid out, as proposed by the bill.

Mr. MACON was opposed to the bill on general grounds, as well as for the further reasons that it would encourage a spirit of speculation among the people, which it was the duty of the Government to discountenance—not to encourage; that all works undertaken by the public became mere jobs; that canals, &c., ought to be made by individual enterprise, or private associations, &c.

Mr. OTIS was also opposed to this bill. He was not in favor of holding out any temptation to purchasers of public lands, which might never be realized. The bill was supported on the ground that it would give additional value to the public lands in that quarter of the country; but if the route of a canal were laid out, the canal itself might never be completed; and Mr. O. was opposed to giving an artificial value to those lands, merely as a lure to people to become purchasers. He argued against affording additional inducements to the purchase of public lands; the land of the United States was sold with sufficient rapidity already, and he wished those sales to go on steadily, but gradually. Besides these reasons, Mr. O. was not in favor of going into the unpeopled region designated by this bill, and there beginning the system of internal improvement. It was beginning at the wrong end. There was a committee appointed on the subject of internal improvement. He wished to leave the subject to this committee; let them extend their views over the whole Union, and see where it would be better to begin this great work, before a blow be struck in it.

Mr. TRIMBLE replied to Mr. OTIS, and went into a description of the present and prospective condition of that part of Ohio, its population, &c., to show the expediency of adopting this measure. He referred to the great extent of the land transportation, which was so heavy a burden on the agriculture of the country that there was no inducement to raise more than sufficient for the consumption of the people there, and that it would be useless to produce any thing for a foreign market; also the burdens on imports, such as salt and other heavy articles. He stated these facts to show the peculiar necessity for affording water transportation by a canal, to the vast population which would certainly spread over that country. The general advantages of such an improvement were too obvious to require illustration from him, and he abstained from touching on them. He argued that this bill would not give an artificial, but a real and intrinsic additional value to the public lands there. A great part of those lands were now reserved from sale, and might continue to be reserved until they should receive their full value from this improvement; and speculation might be thus prevented, as they would then sell for what they were worth. The expense to be incurred by this measure, if authorized, would be inconsiderable, the advantages of it to the Union incalculable. If the bill passed, Congress would not be concluded on the subject, and were expressly not pledged to make the canal. He referred to facts to show, however, that a canal there was very practicable; that there was water sufficient for all its purposes, &c.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, wished, before he could support this bill, more information on the subject than he now possessed. In all incipient measures it was natural to inquire, what next? He desired to know what was to follow this bill. He wanted to know whether this canal was to be made, by whom it was to be made, in whom the property of it or interest would be, &c. It was to go through the lands of the United States; but, he asked, in substance, could the United States have jurisdiction over it when completed? Would the State consent? Would the United States have exclusive jurisdiction without, or even with, the consent of the State? And could the State give exclusive jurisdiction, &c.? These were questions which admitted doubt; though on some of them he himself had none. Suppose the State should choose, for any cause, to stop this canal up, could the United States prevent it, &c.? If not, was it worth while to make a canal over which they might not have complete control? If the State or individuals were to own the canal, were the United States to have no more interest in it than the additional value which it might give to their lands, &c.? He had no doubt the United States could construct roads or canals in the States, but the exclusive control and jurisdiction over the property of them was another question, not so clear, &c.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved the postponement of the bill to Wednesday, as there appeared many doubtful questions connected with this subject, which he wished some little time to examine.

Mr. TRIMBLE spoke at some length, to afford the information required by Mr. HOLMES, and to obviate the objections which he had suggested against the bill; and the bill was then postponed to Wednesday.

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

NATIONAL VACCINE INSTITUTION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of the bill from the House of Representatives to incorporate the National Vaccine Institution.

On this bill there arose a short debate.

Messrs. ROBERTS and TALBOT opposed the bill, on the ground that it was not necessary to the object avowed, which could be easily accomplished without it; that, if necessary, an act of incorporation could be obtained from the State of Maryland sufficient for all useful purposes; that the bill proposed to incorporate an institution without limiting it to the District; that there were within the District so many corporations that the number ought not to be increased, unless under an urgent necessity, &c.

Messrs. HORSEY and LLOYD supported the bill, on the ground of its importance to the proper accomplishment of an object of great interest to humanity, which could not be in any other way so well accomplished. The same explanation of the bill was substantially given as was given of its merits when pending in the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROBERTS had moved a general postponement of the bill; but, with a view to allow gentlemen favorable to the bill to amend it, if they desired, he withdrew his motion; and, on motion of Mr. LLOYD, the bill was postponed to Monday next.

OHIO AND ERIE CANAL.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out a canal between the navigable waters of the Ohio and Lake Erie.

Mr. RUGGLES moved to strike out the clause which provides that nothing in the bill shall be construed as pledging the United States to defray any part of the expense of making the said canal, and to insert, in lieu thereof, a provision that, on the canal being laid out, so much of the proceeds of the sales of public lands in the Delaware district, in Ohio, as should exceed the minimum cash price of one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, should be applied to the purpose of making this canal.

Mr. LOWRIE required a division of the question, so as to take it first on striking out.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, moved to amend the amendment, by adding to the end of it the words, "When the said canal shall have been completed to the satisfaction of Congress."

There grew out of these motions a debate, which was interrupted only by the arrival of the usual hour for adjournment.

Mr. TRIMBLE was opposed in opinion, with regard to this amendment, to his colleague who moved it, because he was favorable to the bill, which he apprehended the proposed amendment might defeat.

With the exception of Mr. TRIMBLE, the other gentlemen who spoke were pro or con the whole scheme of the bill, as well as of the amendment. The bill was supported and opposed by the following gentlemen:

For the bill—Messrs. RUGGLES and TRIMBLE.

Against the bill—Messrs. OTIS, BROWN, MACON, and CHANDLER.

The argument in favor of the general objects of the bill, besides the obvious one of promoting public convenience and private comfort, was, principally, that it would greatly increase the value of the public lands, by facilitating intercourse between them and other parts of the country.

The argument against the bill was not against the policy of such improvements, so much as against any partial measures in regard to internal improvements of this description. If canals were to be made at the expense of the United States, as it was evident this was intended to be, it was suggested that the experiment should begin in improved and populous parts of the country, rather than in the wilderness, &c.

Before any question was decided in regard to the bill, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, January 11.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a statement showing the names and salaries of the clerks employed in his office during the year 1820; and the letter and statement were read.

The bill making a partial appropriation for the military service for the year 1821, was read the third time and passed, with a small amendment requiring the concurrence of the House of Representatives.

Mr. EDWARDS presented a petition, signed by a number of individuals, concerned directly or indirectly as purchasers of public lands prior to the law "making further provision for the sale of the public lands," stating that said law operates injuriously on them, and praying that they may be permitted to apply the payments already made to such portions of their entries as such payments will cover at two dollars per acre, and that the residue may revert to the United States; and the petition was read, and laid on the table.

Mr. NOBLE presented four petitions, signed in like manner, and of the same import and object as the preceding; which were read, and laid on the table.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Nathan Ford, reported a bill for the relief of Nathan Ford; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize the President of the United States to ascertain and designate certain boundaries; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. LANMAN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire whether there are any obstructions to the navigation of the river Thames, in the State of Connecticut, which were placed there by the American ships blockaded during the late war; and, if any, what measures ought to be adopted for the removal of such obstructions.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of granting lands for the purpose of education within the limits of the old States, and agreed thereto.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Pensions on the petition of Moses Wing; and on motion, by Mr. CHANDLER, it was postponed indefinitely.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Pensions, on the petition of Alexander Irwin; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

On motion, by Mr. HOLMES, of Mississippi, the Senate took up and considered, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill to continue in force, for a limited time, the act, entitled "An act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;" and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

OHIO AND ERIE CANAL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the route of a canal from the navigable waters of the Ohio to Lake Erie—the motion made by Mr. RUGGLES to pledge certain proceeds of the sales of the public lands to making the canal being the question under consideration.

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, spoke against the bill, grounding his objections—without examining at all the Constitutional question, but only the question of expediency—on the belief that such a work ought not to be undertaken unless as part of a great system of internal improvement; that this, for several reasons which he adduced, was not the point at which such a system ought to be commenced; that the enhancement of the value of the public lands was not a good argument in favor of the bill, unless the Government meant, in good faith, to make the canal after its course was laid out, and therefore the amendment offered by Mr. RUGGLES was fair and commendable, &c. In order, however, to test the sense of the Senate at once on the bill, which had been fully discussed at the last session, he moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. TRIMBLE followed, and spoke in answer to the arguments used by gentlemen yesterday, and by Mr. WALKER to-day, against the bill—reasoning to show that people would buy the neighboring public lands under a fair calculation of the chances in favor of the making of the canal, formed on a view of the law, and, consequently, no deception would mislead them; and reasoning also against the various local interests and jealousies which opposed this bill, and the commencement of the contemplated work; and arguing that it was only by adopting a plan of this kind by the General Government that the public interest could be promoted, and the improper influence of private interest, which might operate if the work were left to the State, could be avoided, &c.

Mr. MORRIL was opposed to the bill as well on account of its inexpediency, as from well founded doubts of the Constitutional power of Congress to authorize the work, and also from the inability of the Treasury at this time to defray extraordinary expenses, presuming that the cost of the work would be derived indirectly if not directly from the public funds. He viewed it also as a lure held out to the purchasers of the public lands, which he could not support; and thinking that when a business of this kind was commenced it ought to be part of a general plan, the expense defrayed out of a general fund, each State receiving its proportion of it; that this, moreover, was not the suitable place to begin the plan; that it would probably cost a great deal more, judging from other public works, than was now estimated.

Mr. RUGGLES spoke in favor of his amendment and also of the bill, and argued to show that the canal would be made if now authorized; and also to show the vast commerce which would be carried on through the canal, from and to a great part of the Western country; its extensive advantages to that quarter of the Union, and the salutary policy generally of authorizing such a work.

Mr. TRIMBLE again spoke to show that the expense of the canal would never have to be defrayed out of the funds of the General Government; that the expense of the survey would be a mere trifle, and the value of it to Ohio and the whole Western country incalculable. He was particularly desirous that the bill should now pass, because the advantages of it would otherwise be soon lost to the State and the Union, inasmuch as the Indian title being extinguished to the lands, they would be in the market, and would pass into the hands of individuals, &c.

Mr. BARBOUR viewed the question strictly as one of internal improvement, and involving all the considerations connected with that question. It appeared to be the settled sense of the country, though absurd and preposterous in his opinion, that the public funds may be appropriated to works of internal improvement, but that as soon as any work was completed it became derelict and beyond the control of the National Government. He gave a history of the attempts in Congress to authorize and commence a system of internal improvements, and their failure; especially the last serious effort, made in the most unexceptionable aspect, rejected by the veto of President Madison, and which had not the necessary majority in Congress to make the bill a law; and arguing that if that decision were correct, this measure was improper. On the policy of that bill the public sentiment seemed to be about equally divided; and he had at a subsequent session offered a resolution to give the General Government the desired power, which also failed. He would therefore not support a measure now which conflicted with the settled opinion that there existed no power in the General Government to make roads and canals in the States. At any rate, he hoped, if the system were commenced, it would not be in an insulated, narrow, partial manner, but on a great, equitable, and impartial system.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was decidedly against the indefinite postponement of the bill. He insisted that the sentiment of Congress had been expressed by a large majority in favor of making internal improvements; and, without fearing any ill consequences from such a policy, he viewed it as of vital importance to the convenience, the happiness, the harmony, and lasting union of the Republic. But this bill, he argued, did not touch the question referred to by Mr. BARBOUR; and its legality had been settled by the law authorizing the continuation of the Cumberland road to Missouri. He controverted the opinion that this canal would be a local work. It was a great national object, as were all works which brought the different parts of the country together, and promoted their comfort and union; and he was ready to support similar objects in other quarters. He maintained the right of the West to expect some expenditure of the public funds in that quarter of the Union, and thereby aid in some sort the moneyed institutions of that part of the country, &c.; in support of which opinions he spoke at some length.

Mr. MORRIL subjoined a remark or two in support of the opinions he had previously expressed; after which

The question was put on the indefinite postponement of the bill, and decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Chandler, Eaton, Elliot, Gaillard, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Lanman, Lloyd, Macon, Mills, Morrill, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Roberts, Smith, Taylor, Tichenor, Walker of Alabama, Walker of Georgia, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tenn.—26.

So the bill was rejected.

RELIEF TO LAND PURCHASERS.

The Senate then, agreeably to the order of the day, took up in Committee of the Whole, the bill for the relief of the purchasers of public lands prior to the first day of July, 1820.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois, said, that, by the laws in operation before the 1st of July, 1820, the mini-minimum price of the public land was two dollars an acre, payable one-fourth down, one-fourth at the end of two years, and one-fourth at the end of each of the two succeeding years; one year of grace was allowed to the purchaser after the last payment became due. If the payments were not completed within that period, the land was offered at public sale; if it sold for more than was due, the surplus was paid to the purchaser. If it would not sell for the amount due, it reverted to the United States. Interest, in case of non-payment of any instalment when it became due, was charged upon such payment. A deduction of eight per cent. was allowed to purchasers for prompt payment.

By the act of the 24th April, 1820, credit was abolished, and the minimum price of the public land reduced to one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre. The probable consequence of that measure, said Mr. T., if no provision is made to counteract it, will be the forfeiture of all the land purchased prior to the 1st of July, 1820, upon which the first payment only has been made, except where valuable improvements have been made, upon a quarter or half-quarter section. On all purchases at the minimum price, in that situation, the purchaser will save, by the forfeiture, twenty-five cents an acre, unless competition at the resale should increase the price. Where a higher price has been given, the saving will be increased in proportion to that price, unless competition at the resale should be as great as at the original sale. When the situation of the country, at the time the great mass of debt was contracted for the public lands, is considered, and contrasted with the present circumstances of those disposed to become purchasers of those lands, it will be readily perceived that the idea of increased competition, at any sale which may be made of lands that may be forfeited, will not be realized. The immense quantity of land which the Government has in the market, of itself, independent of the unfavorable change which has occurred in the capacity of the community to purchase, would greatly diminish the fear of competition, which is the only inducement on the part of the public debtor not to suffer the land purchased by him to revert to the United States.

It is, therefore, the interest of the Government, in a pecuniary point of view, to afford that measure of relief which will diminish the motive with purchasers to suffer their lands to revert to the United States.

But it is conceived, said Mr. T., that considerations of a higher nature are involved in this investigation. All governments ought to act so as to command the love and confidence of the governed. In this country, where the people are sovereign, the Government will always act in conformity to their sovereign will. The question, then, ought to be decided upon considerations of policy, of justice, and equity, and not by those of interest alone.

Independent of the motive to a liberal and magnanimous conduct to the public debtors, resulting from the act of the Government diminishing the minimum price, other circumstances present themselves and press with irresistible force upon the consideration of the Legislature. It is matter of general notoriety, that, when the greatest portion of this debt was contracted, the price of produce of every description was more than an hundred per cent. higher than at present.

Banks which had multiplied, and, apparently, in some instances, been located with the express view of furnishing facilities to the purchasers of public lands, had rendered money, or what was then deemed money, so plenty, that a momentary frenzy seized upon the purchasers of public lands. Prices were bid for lands wholly unimproved greatly beyond what lands of equal quality, and highly improved, in the neighboring States, would have commanded.

Shortly after these purchases were made, produce fell to less than half the price which it then commanded; the facilities afforded by banks were suddenly withdrawn, by the drain of specie from their vaults, or notes ceasing to be receivable in consequence of their bankruptcy.

The public debtor, by these occurrences, found himself embarrassed by engagements which it would have been difficult for him to fulfil, and which the change in the price of the public land has considerably aggravated. It is unnecessary to charge the Government with having contributed to the error which has been committed by the purchasers of the public lands, to induce it to afford relief. It is sufficient, for that purpose, to show that great loss will inevitably fall upon their purchasers unless relief is granted, and, that no benefit will inure to the Government from that loss. In all governments, even the most despotic, the resources of the Government consist of the surplus means of the Government. If the people are impoverished, the revenues of the Government are dried up, and all its operations enfeebled; this is the true reason why free States are always more powerful and fruitful in their resources than despotic States.

It is, however, admitted, that, if the Government should exact the penalty of the law, it would apparently be benefited in a pecuniary view. It would retain the whole of the money received on the improvident purchases which have been described, and have the land which would revert at its disposition. This benefit, however, would be apparent only, and not real. The state of destitution to which this exaction would reduce the purchasers would destroy all competition among the purchasers at the resale of those lands; and a sense of the extreme rigor which had been exercised towards them, would restrain the citizens of other States disposed to purchase from entering into the competition. Sympathy, even among those disposed to better their situation by removal from the place of their nativity, would afford that relief which the equity and magnanimity of the Government ought to have promptly granted. But if this opinion should be deemed erroneous, still, any pecuniary benefit which the Government might be supposed to derive from the rigid exaction of the conditions, would be more than balanced by the increased payments in the Treasury, which the relief to which the purchasers are equitably entitled would produce, in the year 1821, and by the uniformity of the receipts from that source of revenue during the eight succeeding years.

The right to relinquish, proposed by the bill, would probably diminish the debt $4,000,000. The prompt payments which would be produced by the discount tendered in the bill would probably further reduce it $3,000,000. There would then remain $15,000,000 which would, according to the third proposition in the bill, produce an annual revenue of $1,875,000.

This sum, with the amount of new purchases made during that term, could not fail to produce an annual revenue of $2,500,000. From these general considerations, Mr. President, I shall proceed to a particular examination of the provisions of the bill.

1st. The right to relinquish is an equitable consequence of the change which the Government has made in the minimum price of the public land.

If the purchaser should, by any cause whatever, be under the necessity of selling a part of his land to discharge his debt to the Government, the price which he will be able to obtain for it will be affected by that change, and his ability to make the payment diminished in the proportion which two hundred bears to one hundred and twenty-five. It is rational to presume that such will be the consequence, as the quantity of land which the Government has for sale will, for a much longer term than that proposed in the bill for the final extinguishment of the debt, greatly exceed the demand for it for settlement, or for speculation. The exorbitant price given for a portion of the public lands, and the inability of the purchasers to pay that price, appeals strongly to the equity and magnanimity of Congress. The first section of the bill does not propose to reduce the price of the land retained by the purchaser; it only releases him from what it is impracticable to perform.

The Government receives back its property, which will again by it be sold for what it is really worth. The right of relinquishment cannot be exercised so as to release the purchaser from his bargain, as far as the purchase-money has been paid.

2. To excite to prompt payment, as well as to grant equitable relief to the purchasers of public land, the second section provides that when the full purchase-money for any tract of land shall be paid on a certain day, a deduction shall be made. This provision is almost a necessary consequence of the change which has been made in the minimum price of the public lands by the act of the 24th April, 1820. Nothing can be more equitable than the tender to the former purchaser of the option of paying, on a given day, the whole sum for any tract of land, subject to a deduction equal to the proportion which the former minimum price bears to the present. Considering the state of the Treasury, any measure which will increase the payments on account of the debt due for the public land ought to receive due consideration. For the want of punctuality in the payment of this debt, the Government is compelled to borrow money. A reduction for prompt payment, not inconsistent with the equity, would greatly increase the payments into the Treasury during the present year, and correspondently diminish the amount necessary to be obtained by loan. It may appear, upon first consideration, that the foregoing provisions present all the relief to which the parties are equitably entitled, and which the Government can, consistently with due regard to justice, grant. It may be urged that, after the parties have been permitted to relinquish such part of the land purchased by them as they may think proper, and a reasonable deduction made for prompt payment has been tendered to them, that no cause of complaint can exist, no case of oppression can occur. To this it may be answered, that cases may still exist in which it may be the interest of the parties to suffer the lands purchased by them to revert. Under the former system tracts of not less than one hundred and sixty acres were sold, with the exception of sections numbers two, five, twenty, twenty-three, and thirty, in each township, which were divided into half-quarters, in the former case, where but a single tract has been purchased by an individual, the right of relinquishment cannot in many instances be exercised without great loss to the purchaser; and in the latter it would be inconvenient and impolitic to admit of the right to relinquish. In such cases the parties are presumed, from the quantity purchased, to be poor. Their poverty will probably disable them from making prompt payment. They will therefore be driven to the necessity of suffering their small farms to revert. If saved from this necessity, it will be by the compliance with terms from which they see their wealthy neighbors exempt. But it has been shown to be their interest to suffer their lands to revert, and run the risk of repurchasing, when the land shall be again offered for sale. It certainly never can be sound policy in any Government to act in such a manner as to make it the interest of its citizens voluntarily, and from a regard to their pecuniary interests, to incur forfeitures, and to fail in the fulfilment of engagements which, though not legally, ought always to be considered morally binding. Such an example could not fail to have a baleful influence upon the public morality. Such an example will be exhibited by the act of the 24th of April, 1820, reducing the minimum price of the public land from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, if the third section of the bill, or one analogous to it in principle, shall not be adopted by the National Legislature. By that act it is clearly made the interest of the purchaser to fail in his engagements with the Government, and run the risk of purchasing at a cheaper rate when the lands shall be reoffered for sale. The third provision is clearly an alternative offered to those who cannot accept of the second. All those whose pecuniary means will not enable them to avail themselves of the second, will consider that justice is inequitably distributed between the poor and the rich, if by the rejection of the third they are compelled, from a regard to their interest, to suffer their small farms to revert to the United States.

But the third section of the bill is strongly rec-commended to the attention of the Senate—1. Because it will prevent reversions; 2. Will secure a greater revenue from the land retained than if it was suffered to revert; and, 3. Will produce a greater degree of punctuality in the payments into the Treasury, during the time of its operation, than can be obtained by any other provision in the power of the Legislature to adopt. If there was no other recommendation in its favor, this ought to command the unqualified assent of the Senate. The purchaser will see, in the conditions tendered, a sufficient inducement to avoid a reversion, and inducements not less strong will impel him to the most rigid punctuality in making the payments required by the provisions of the section.

In favor of the term of eight years, which has been fixed upon by a majority of the committee, it may be urged that the indulgence which has been heretofore granted by Congress has in some degree directed its decision. It is admitted that the situation of the parties which will be affected by it is different, and that if it was practicable to adapt the provisions of the section to their various cases, it would have been done; but, considering this measure as an act of liberality, and at the same time calculated to have a salutary influence upon the fiscal operations of the Government, it was considered more important to introduce a uniform rule, the operation of which would be easily comprehended, than to encumber the section with the complex provisions which otherwise would have been indispensable.

For these reasons, I think the provisions of the bill are such as to be entitled to the consideration of the Senate.

I cannot close my remarks on a question so interesting to the people I have the honor to represent, without reminding the Senate that the attention of Congress was called to this subject by the President of the United States in his Message to both Houses of Congress at the commencement of the present session, and that a plan for the relief of the purchasers of public lands under the ancient system was submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, not different in principle from the bill under consideration.

It is my duty to state, Mr. President, that there was some difference of opinion in the committee in relation to this bill, but all were in favor of granting relief to those concerned in its provisions.

Mr. EDWARDS, of Illinois, rose, and expressing a hope that the great importance of the subject then under discussion to the nation, and more particularly the deep interest which the people of the State he had the honor in part to represent had in it, would be a sufficient apology for his asking the attention of the Senate to the remarks he felt it his duty to offer to its consideration, proceeded to notice certain defects in the bill, and, among others, suggested that, by its phraseology, the relief which it proposed to grant was limited, and confined to the direct purchasers from the Government, to the entire exclusion of those who had purchased from individuals lands subject to the lien of the Government, for the instalments that are still due upon them; which latter class, he contended, if they were not the most numerous, were in general the most deserving of relief, because they were principally composed of persons who, having gone to the respective States in which the public lands lie, strangers, and not knowing where to find vacant land, or being desirous of settling in the vicinities of friends and acquaintances who had preceded them, had generally purchased at an advanced price, and of course would, in proportion to their purchases, be the greatest sufferers. But, said he, what is still worse, by the provisions of the bill as it now reads, the original purchasers have the right to relinquish the very lands which they have sold, in many instances, at an exorbitant profit, and to appropriate to themselves the benefit of all the instalments that have been paid by their assignees. These objections, however, said he, may be easily obviated by substituting the word holders in the place of purchasers. Other amendments he thought most obviously necessary; but, said he, in this stage of the bill, it may be most advisable to discuss its general objects, which, by eliciting the views of different gentlemen, may enable us to ascertain with the more certainty and precision what provisions and amendments will be most acceptable to the majority of the Senate.

All agree that relief is necessary. Much diversity of opinion, however, may exist as to what it should be. And, in order justly to appreciate the claims which the debtors for public land have upon the humanity and justice of this Government, it seems to be necessary to advert to the times of artificial and fictitious prosperity that are recently past, and to contrast them with the present disastrous turn of affairs which we see every day more and more realized; and this for the double purpose of accounting for the causes that have seduced that class of our fellow-citizens into a condition which renders the beneficent interposition of Congress necessary to them; and at the same time to demonstrate the expediency, on the part of Congress, of extending to them such relief as their situation requires, and as is not forbidden by the dictates of a liberal and enlightened policy, and a just regard to the public interest.

Mr. President, said Mr. E., I discard from my view of this subject all mercenary considerations of profit to the Government, from granting the relief proposed by this bill. Narrow considerations of interest, nice calculations of pecuniary profit, when the great question is one of legislative grace and relief, to a considerable and suffering portion of the community, seem to me to be out of place on this floor. I never can ask this Senate to do what I consider wrong, because it may produce a profit to the nation. Nor will I ask it to do what I consider right in itself by appealing to any such contracted and mercenary considerations. A course like this may suit the superannuated, corrupt, and tottering monarchies on the other side of the Atlantic, living from hand to mouth by the expedients of the day, and hastening their downfall by the very food on which they feed; but such a course is, in my opinion, as unsuited to the meridian as it is inconsistent with the dignity of a great, a youthful, a vigorous, and magnanimous Republic—a Republic founded on the affections of the people; flowing from them as the great fountain of power—instituted solely for their happiness, and, consequently, ever ready to administer, from the purest motives, a just relief to their sufferings. This Government, sir, depends for its successful operations on the affections of the people. They can never have affection for a Government which they cannot respect. And what respect can be felt for a Government which, professing to do an act of grace, founds that act on a cold calculation of a return of profit? Charity is certainly one of the most amiable of virtues; yet, what would be thought of that charity which should be bestowed on an arithmetical estimate of usurious interest? Considerations of this sort, Mr. President, are, in my opinion, unworthy of the grave and enlightened deliberations of this Senate. I will not urge them. I cannot rely on them. No, sir, any measure of relief which may be afforded by the National Legislature, should bear the general stamp of an act of grace to the individuals interested; it should also be a measure of wise and just policy in relation to the Union. I am no advocate, Mr. President, for the romantic and ostentatious display of generosity on the part of this Government; and this case would not receive the support of my poor abilities, did I not believe that relief is necessary to prevent real, extensive, eminent, and, in my opinion, at least, unmerited suffering. The debt is of such magnitude, that, in point of fact, it cannot possibly be paid in the present state of affairs. Had the people of the West incurred this debt by any imprudence peculiar to themselves, they might have had no claims to your sympathy. But there was no peculiar imprudence in this case. It was no malady confined to that country. It was the general mania that raged universally throughout the land; and, even if the fever was hotter there, it was only because the pabulum which fed it was more copious and tempting.

That these people have erred, miscalculated, and purchased public land greatly beyond their ability to pay for it, is evident enough from the enormous sum which, from the Message of the President of the United States, referred to by the gentleman who has just resumed his seat, (Mr. THOMAS,) it appears that they now owe on that account. But, taking into view the frailties and imperfections of human nature, the want of sufficient foresight, which is the common lot of man, and the illusions of hope, which too easily cheat us into the belief of the practicability of that which we wish to accomplish, the case makes a strong appeal to our compassion. There are, indeed, also, some circumstances in this case, with a part of which the Government has been so intimately connected as ought not only to prevent it from regarding those people with the sternness of stoic indifference, and leaving them to all the unmitigated consequences of the errors into which they have been betrayed, but loudly appeal to the sympathies, clemency, and magnanimity, and even the justice of the National Legislature, and demand the utmost alleviation which it can reasonably grant.

Infatuated as all classes of our fellow-citizens have been, by a short-lived prosperity, which, though depending wholly upon temporary causes, too many believed would be permanent, and too few supposed would end so soon, it is hardly to be supposed that our free representative Government should have been totally exempt from the influence of the general delusion, or that it should not have participated in it, and even given rise to a portion of it.

In all such Governments as ours, the people and Government must necessarily, to a certain extent, at least, reciprocally act upon and influence each other; and therefore, in intimating the opinion that the Government itself did contribute to the delusion which misled our fellow-citizens into excessive purchase of public lands, I do not wish to be understood as imputing any blame or censure whatever, but merely as speaking of things as they actually have been; and as, from the intimate connexion between the people and Government, they must necessarily have been.

The long convulsions in Europe, which grew out of the French Revolution, by furnishing us with a ready and most extraordinary market for our produce, and by the advantages which they afforded to our navigation and commerce, had produced such unparalleled prosperity that the whole nation had become so intoxicated with its ephemeral success as to overlook the causes from whence its prosperity sprung, and upon which its continuance depended.

The late war, so far from abating in the least degree the fallacious calculations that were but too generally indulged, produced a train of events which inspired new and more extravagant hopes and expectations, the causes of which I will endeavor briefly to explain.

In the prosecution of the war, the exigencies of the Government became so pressing that it found itself reduced to the expediency of borrowing large sums of money of the local banks, which it was well known they could not lend without suspending specie payments. And, although the value of bank notes in general must depend upon their convertibility into specie, yet, seeing that the war could not be prosecuted with effect without those loans, public opinion, co-operating with the Government, so far sanctioned the consequent suspensions of specie payments that few men would venture to refuse to take the paper of these banks, lest they should be denounced as enemies to their country. The Government used it to support the war and pay its debts. Public creditors were obliged to receive it, and, to render it as current as possible, it was made receivable in the land offices—all of which circumstances combined to give to it the character of a fair representative of so much real coin. And thus were those banks tempted and seduced to issue a most unexampled and unjustifiable profusion of paper, from which exorbitant profits were made, that generated a spirit of banking which operated like a contagion, and produced a vast multiplication of such institutions—some of which were fortunate enough to have their paper also made receivable in payment for public lands.

JANUARY, 1821.

Relief to Land Purchasers.

SENATE.

These banks were anxious to loan money. The facilities with which it could be obtained could not fail to allure the enterprising citizens of this free and aspiring Republic into almost every species of active adventure and bold speculation, as well as many of them into inconsiderate extravagance. And hence there were many borrowers, and finally an issue of paper so greatly exceeding the whole amount of the current coin of the United States as to beget an infatuation little if any thing short of that which was produced in France and England about a century ago by the memorable Mississippi and South-Sea schemes.

In addition to this monstrous augmentation of our circulating medium, a large number of claims for land on the northwest side of the Ohio, which had been recognised by the Old Congress in 1787, had been converted into certificates, which, as well as the Mississippi stock, were made receivable in payment for public lands—thereby increasing the facilities of paying for, and the temptation to buy, those lands.

It was during this tide of visionary prosperity, which innocent credulity fondly hoped would never ebb, that the most of those purchases were made; and indeed the delusion continued so long, that the hopes and expectations of the most sanguine seemed to acquire strong confirmation of their fancied practicability.

Nor was this infatuation confined to the purchasers of public land, nor to the ignorant, uninformed, and inconsiderate part of the community. It affected all classes of society, and even the Government itself. It gave to every species of property a fictitious value; produced an entire revolution in the manners and habits of our fellow-citizens; substituted in the place of that republican simplicity which had heretofore characterized us, all the extravagant pomp and pageantry of Royalty itself; and gave birth to a multitude of the wildest projects and most visionary speculations.

Our means were thought adequate to accomplish all that the imagination could suggest, or that art could execute, to minister to the comforts, convenience, interest, or pride, of individuals; or to the improvement, embellishment, and aggrandizement, of our country; and of all the various improvements, adventures, or undertakings, by individuals or corporations, which distinguish those times, nothing was attempted but upon the most magnificent scale.

The excessive importations of foreign goods that were made immediately succeeding the peace, and which have proved so ruinous to those who were concerned in them, had so greatly augmented the public revenue, that it was deemed expedient to abolish all internal taxation. The greatest difficulty that seemed to present itself, even to our wisest politicians, was to devise ways and means of disposing of the vast sums which it was supposed would overflow the national coffers. And hence, among other things, was that rage for internal improvements which, agitating the nation from North to South and from East to West, put in requisition the highest order of talents, and produced the most powerful arguments and splendid displays of eloquence which this or any other country can boast, to demonstrate that this Government either had or ought to have delegated power to accomplish this great national object. And yet not one of those keen-sighted politicians and distinguished orators could have imagined that at this early day we should not only be without a single cent to appropriate to such purposes; but that the state of our Treasury should be relied upon as affording the most powerful argument for overthrowing valuable institutions and suspending measures which recent and melancholy experience has evinced to be necessary for our future protection.

The miscalculations and indiscretions of the purchasers of public land, therefore, are not to be wondered at. Even that able statesman, who now so honorably to himself, and so advantageously to his country, fills the first station in the Government, after visiting the Western country, considered the purchase of public land at the minimum price so advantageous to the purchasers, and so injurious to the public interest, that he felt it his duty to recommend to Congress an augmentation of the price. In consequence of which an immense quantity of public land was immediately purchased, with the firm belief that the measure recommended by the President would be adopted. At length, however, those splendid and bewitching visions began to disappear. The paper in circulation, no longer supported by the exigencies of the Government, began to lose its credit, and much of it ceased to answer the purposes of a circulating medium; to supply the want of which was one of the most powerful arguments for the establishment of the Bank of the United States, whose operations soon annihilated many of the local banks, and crippled and prostrated the balance, to the incalculable injury of those who had been induced to rely upon them, by the credit and currency which the Government itself had given to their notes. And thus, after using those banks for the payment of its debts, and seducing our fellow-citizens to rely upon them for the payment of theirs, the Government became instrumental in accelerating the overthrow and ruin of those institutions, to which they had principally exposed themselves by the very loans which they had made to the Government.

The Bank of the United States was, however, relied upon as the great panacea that was to restore to healthful vigor our expiring prosperity. Wise men contended, and good ones sincerely believed, that it would effectually remedy evils that were in themselves incurable, and which nothing but time, with the utmost industry, prudence, and economy, could even alleviate. But if it has not verified all the predictions of its enemies, it has certainly so far disappointed the hopes, expectations, and promises of its most reasonable and intelligent friends; for, notwithstanding all the promised amelioration of our condition by this expedient, it most unquestionably aggravated the distress and embarrassments of the whole Western country, at least by prematurely destroying, with rash and inconsiderate hostility, the local currency, without substituting any adequate medium in its place.

The circulating medium of the Union was soon reduced from one hundred and ten to forty-five millions of dollars, of which residue the Western country neither did nor could participate, in proportion either to its numbers or its wants, as must be evident from the immense sums which have been drawn from it on account of public lands; from the balance of trade, as proved by the rate of exchange having been constantly against it, and from the disproportionate expenditure of public money in the Atlantic States.

Money, therefore, with us, became scarce, and within the last two years has almost entirely disappeared. No sound currency remains. Every species of property has lost its value. The products of agriculture have ceased to reward the labor employed in growing them. Commerce languishes. Our manufactures have gone to decay; and nothing is now to be seen but the hopeless despair and ruin which these portentous vicissitudes have occasioned. And hence it is that we have heard so much of the various efforts of several of the most respectable State Legislatures to relieve the embarrassments, alleviate the distress, and avert the ruin, that threatens to overwhelm their fellow-citizens. And, although we may not approve of all the expedients that have been resorted to for that purpose, yet the disposition which they manifest is worthy of our imitation, and ought to be most seriously regarded by us as proof that public sentiment demands of us the utmost relief which it is in our power, consistently with our duty, to extend to a suffering community.

Mr. President, said Mr. E., the records of history furnish no instances of an infatuation so universal, with consequences so much to be deplored, as that which has pervaded our own country, unless they are to be found in the famous Mississippi and South Sea schemes, to which I have already alluded, and which were not more disastrous to the people of France and England than would be the situation of the debtors for public land, if, with all their other engagements to pay money, the Government should continue to hold them bound to pay the prodigious sum of near twenty-three millions of dollars, which they now owe, or lose all the instalments that they have already paid.

It is true, sir, that those cases are not precisely analogous to our own, but they are not without some traits of similitude, for the agency and influence of Government is visible in all of them; and the evils produced in each case primarily resulted from the countenance afforded by Government to incorporated companies, by using them for the payment of public debts, and giving to them a credit which they never otherwise could have acquired. And, although our Government was not, like those of France and England, directly interested in and connected with those moneyed corporations by whose aid it paid its debts, yet there cannot be a doubt that, to the loans which it made from them, to the countenance it afforded to their suspension of specie payments, and to the credit and currency which it gave to their notes, under such circumstances, are justly to be attributed that undue multiplication of banks, and that superabundant issue of paper which have caused the distress that afflicts and the ruin that threatens our suffering fellow-citizens.

Mr. E. dilated upon the conduct of the Government in relation to those banks, and declared that he did verily believe that, but for the loans which it had made from them, and its consequent conduct, we should have escaped the fatal consequences which we all now so sincerely deplore, and which, though they were doubtless not designed, might have been foreseen, because they are the natural consequences of the conduct of the Government, for which it could have no apology except that which is to be found in its necessities at that particular period.

Mr. President, said Mr. E., France and England did not hesitate, in the cases referred to, to extend to their subjects the most prompt and effectual relief that was practicable. Have you less sympathy for the sufferings of your free and patriotic fellow-citizens? Will you hesitate to relieve them when the most that is asked of you is to forbear to take advantage of the indiscretions into which they have been decoyed? To relinquish a mere speculation, which a liberal-minded individual would not hesitate to cancel under similar circumstances?

Mr. President, were the debtors for public lands entirely free from all other embarrassments, it is evident that so small a portion of the community must be utterly unable, in the present state of affairs, to pay the enormous sum which they now owe the Government; a sum that exceeds one-half of the whole amount of the circulating medium of the United States, and is constantly increasing by the accumulation of interest. But, sir, the same causes that have embarrassed others have most certainly equally operated upon them; and there is no part of your population, who, in proportion to their means of payment, have probably contracted a greater mass of other engagement—none whose situation required a greater expenditure of money, as must be obvious to all those who will reflect upon the cost of moving to and making improvements in a new country; the length of time that is necessary to render farms productive, and the necessity, in the mean time, of purchasing every article of husbandry, clothing, and subsistence, with cash.

Besides a great variety of other debts, which the temporary success of themselves, or others, in land speculations, seduced many of those persons to contract, in the vain hope of discharging them with the profits which they expected to realize from the land purchasers, a vast proportion of them are doubtless still indebted to banks or individuals for the very money with which they paid the first instalments upon those lands, whilst, in addition to all the other causes which have contributed to produce their inability to fulfil their engagements, you have depreciated their lands, and destroyed all hopes of resource from the sale of them, by reducing the price of the residue of that part of your own which you have purchased of the Indians, amounting to one hundred and seventy-two millions of acres, to one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre; and immediately bringing into competition with them upwards of fifty-four millions of acres, that are now actually surveyed and in the market; which are events that could not have been foreseen, and certainly were not anticipated by those debtors.

Relief to Land Purchasers.

SENATE.

As, then, it is absolutely impossible for them to complete their payments for the lands which they have purchased, it follows that, without the relief which Congress alone can afford them, they must forfeit all that they have already paid on that account, which, if no one of them has paid more than one instalment, cannot be less than between seven and eight millions of dollars; for, as has been correctly stated by my colleague, the law required payments for public lands to be divided into four equal instalments, one of which must have been paid down at the time of making each respective purchase, and, therefore, it is impossible that those debtors can owe the amount reported to be due, without having paid the sum which I have stated. So, if they have paid two instalments, the amount liable to forfeiture is precisely equal to that which is due. And, as many of them have paid two or more instalments, there can be no doubt that the amount greatly exceeds the minimum which I have mentioned.

But, were the sum to be forfeited, only eight millions of dollars, which, if every one who is able, should complete his payments, is, I am sure, the very least that it could possibly be, it surely cannot be difficult to conceive of the individual distress that would be produced, and the dangerous ferments and commotions that might be excited by such a prodigious sacrifice as the total forfeiture of that amount, being nearly equal to one-fifth of our whole circulating medium.

This, however, sir, is an aspect of the case upon which I forbear all further remark, lest I should seem to expect from your fears that which I am very certain would be much more readily yielded to the superior claims upon your humanity and justice. And, indeed, sir, I have no hesitation in saying that, whatever may be your ultimate decision upon the case now under consideration, it will be as likely to be acquiesced in, and submitted to, in the West, as it would be, under similar circumstances, in any other part of the United States; for the people of the Western country, not less patriotic than brave, are second to none in the most devoted attachment to the Union; whose advantage to themselves they duly appreciate, well knowing, among other things, that, with but one single outlet for the products of their country, of such vast extent and unrivalled fertility, they must look to the Atlantic States for that naval protection which, from the peculiarity of their own situation, they are unable to create for themselves. They also believe that their Atlantic brethren, who must become the carriers of their produce, cannot fail to see in their prosperity the best means of increasing their own, by the additional encouragement which it would afford to their navigation and commerce—objects of great national importance, which the Western people have not been backward in assisting to cherish and to protect.

They have, moreover, seen, with great satisfaction, in some recent measures, a pledge of those liberal feelings towards them, which has allayed all former fears, and forbids the belief that any motive of hostility or jealousy could, in the least degree, influence your decision on the present occasion; and I flatter myself that there is no gentleman of this honorable Senate who, under any circumstances, could find so much cruelty in his heart as to be willing to take from those people even eight millions of dollars, and at the same time keep all the lands for which those dollars were given, together with all the improvements that have been made upon the lands. No, sir; humanity, justice, and sound policy, equally forbid it.

The only real difficulty, therefore, that presents itself is, to decide upon the relief which it is expedient and proper to grant. In considering which, the obvious policy of making it so liberal as to prevent all hopes of advantage from future applications to Congress upon the subject, ought not to be overlooked; for experience proves, that where relief in such cases is frequently granted, which must always be likely to happen when it has been inadequate in the first instance, it never fails to beget an habitual dependence upon it, which prevents the necessary exertions to make payment, and often creates a state of things that renders it difficult to refuse, and sometimes necessary to grant, further indulgence, than would have been necessary had sufficient liberality been dispensed in the first instance.

With this view of the subject, it appears to me that the first great object should be to diminish the debt, which can be accomplished justly in two ways—

1st. By permitting purchasers who are unable to pay for the whole of their lands, to relinquish a part of them, upon equitable terms.

2d. By offering just and proper inducements to make prompt payment.

It is the object of the bill now under consideration, to accomplish the first of these measures, by permitting the holders of a plurality of half-quarter sections of land, upon which the whole instalments have not been paid, to relinquish as many entire half-quarter sections as they please, with the privilege of having the money paid thereon applied to their credit, upon such as they may retain.

It is scarcely necessary to remind the Senate, that, as the public lands were required by law to be sold in tracts not exceeding a quarter section in any case, and a half-quarter section in some cases, the sale of each quarter or half-quarter section, as the case may have been, is to be considered as a distinct contract, and therefore the practical effects of the indulgence asked for would be but little, if any thing, more than to enable those unfortunate and distressed public debtors to get rid of so many separate and distinct contracts with the Government as they are unable to comply with, and admits of no arbitrary selections, contrary to the subdivisions which Congress itself has created.

And, besides the inutility and folly of requiring men to perform impossibilities, the Government, in granting this indulgence, will still be in as good a situation as if those improvident contracts had never been made; for, if it does not get the money most imprudently contracted to be paid for its land, it gets back the land itself, without any deterioration, while the purchasers cannot get a single acre for which they will not have paid the Government a full equivalent; and thus the evils which have their origin in an excess of those contracts will be most naturally corrected by diminishing their number, upon such terms as will leave both parties in as good a situation as they would have been in if such excess had never existed.

This measure is greatly to be preferred to any plan of indulgence, whose object is a mere extension of the times of payment; for, embarrassed as those debtors now are, in common with the rest of their fellow citizens, by other engagements, and deprived of all resource in the sale of their lands, by the conduct of the Government in reducing the price of its own; the entire change in our commercial relations, and the permanent loss of foreign markets for all, or nearly all, the great staples of our country, leave no ground to hope that they will be able at any future time, whatever indulgence may be granted to them, to pay the amount which they now owe the Government.

But, even if they should be able to pay, it is not reasonable to suppose that they will do so, since Congress has made it the interest of a great majority of them to forfeit all that they have already paid, rather than to pay the balance that is due. This is particularly the case with all those who have paid one instalment only; for, supposing them to have purchased at the minimum price, they still have to pay one dollar and fifty cents an acre, with interest, while they can purchase as good or better land of the Government, at one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, without interest; at which price they will be able to repurchase the very lands that may be forfeited when they shall be again offered for sale.

Therefore, taking it for granted that the Government would not wish, under the circumstances that have been mentioned, like a ruthless, heartless sharper, to take advantage of forfeitures which its own conduct had rendered it the interest of a large and meritorious class of citizens to subject themselves to, and seeing that these contracts neither can nor will be complied with, there seems to be no reasonable motive to refuse, and the strongest inducements to grant, to those debtors the privilege of relinquishing a part of their lands, upon the terms proposed, whereby the debt would be diminished. The lands would immediately revert to the Government, and could be disposed of for its benefit, to persons who would improve them. The debtors would be relieved from a debt which, pressing upon them like an incubus, paralyzes all their energies, and destroys their enterprise; and the prosperity of the States in which they reside would be greatly promoted—for it cannot be disguised, that almost all the citizens in some of those States have purchased more land than they can pay for; and, while the fear of losing their lands prevents many from improving them, the desire of others to save as much of the money which they have already advanced as possible, induces them to lay up every cent that they can command for that purpose, and prevents other improvements that would greatly enhance the value of the public lands, and are absolutely necessary to those States.

Strong as these considerations recommend and enjoin the adoption of the measure now under consideration as one of necessary and just relief to those debtors, and of wise and correct policy in relation to the Union, there is an additional view of the subject which exhibits claims to relief which no court of chancery, were it a case between individuals, could refuse to decree and enforce. And I trust that the high character for good faith and honor which this Government has so deservedly acquired at home and abroad is a sufficient pledge that it would not in any case disregard those principles of moral justice which, under precisely similar circumstances, would be obligatory upon individuals.

In order to understand correctly the mutual obligations between the Government and those purchasers, in relation to those contracts, reference must be had to the law under which they were made. It may safely be premised that all the terms offered, and inducements held out to the purchasers by the law, when acceded to by them, became, upon every fair principle of legal construction, as well as of moral justice, obligatory upon the Government, and consequently that the latter could not, without a palpable violation of such obligations, deprive those purchasers of any advantages which the positive declarations of the law at the time of contracting promised them, and which may fairly be considered as having constituted a part (and no inconsiderable either) of the inducements to enter into those contracts.

By the law it was explicitly declared that no public land should be sold for a less price than two dollars per acre. The payments were divided into four equal instalments—one of which was to be paid down at the time of making the purchase. On completing his payments, any purchaser was entitled to his patent; but, if he did not choose to pay within five years from the date of his purchase, the land was to be sold, and all that it might sell for above what was due upon it was to be returned to the first purchaser. Thus every one in purchasing had the two alternatives presented to him, either to purchase with a view to obtain his patent, or to receive the profits upon his money, arising from the enhanced value of the land within five years. Both alternatives were equally fair and legitimate objects of contract, because equally authorized by it. The latter alternative was doubtless presented by the Government to promote sales. Its acceptance therefore by purchasers was a fair and authorized speculation, consistent with the views of the Government, whose object has always been to sell as much land as possible, without any discrimination with regard to the objects of purchasers. It cannot therefore excuse itself from granting relief to those persons by affecting to consider them as the less entitled to it for being speculators, in yielding to the very temptations with which it seduced them, if indeed there were any thing wrong in the speculation itself. There are however a vast number of persons who have been induced to rely wholly upon the latter alternative from necessity, not choice. No one who purchased with such objects, particularly at the minimum price, and made judicious selections, could have lost by it, and many would have made a considerable profit, had not the price of public land been reduced, contrary to the pledged faith of the Government.

The adoption of this measure has not only depreciated the lands heretofore sold, impaired the ability of purchasers to pay for their lands, and made it their interest to surrender them, but, in relation to all those who relied upon the sale of the lands according to law for the reimbursement of the instalments paid upon them, with a reasonable profit upon their money, it has most injuriously affected their condition; deprived them of advantages connected with their contracts; subjected them to great losses, that could not have been anticipated at the time those contracts were entered into; and would most unquestionably, were it a case between individuals, render it the duty of a court of equity to decree that those contracts should be set aside altogether.

Let me suppose, sir, that the public lands had belonged to an individual who under similar circumstances had sold a part of them, not barely with an understanding, but with a positive, unequivocal declaration, that he would not reduce the price of the residue. Can it, I ask, be doubted, that if he had totally disregarded that declaration, as the Government has done, with so much injury to the purchasers, a court of equity would hesitate to grant relief? These purchasers are ex equo et bono entitled to a return of their money, and the Government ought, for its own sake, be glad to compromise with them upon the terms proposed by the measure now under consideration.

Mr. E. further contended that this measure, by enabling the Government to cause to be settled a large quantity of lands now held by persons who can never pay for them, and therefore will not improve them, would have a tendency to consolidate our settlements, and impart additional strength to our inland frontier; and that it would give a spring to industry which, by increasing our stock of national wealth, would be felt advantageously by the whole Union. But, said he, Mr. President, though those public debtors may see but little prospect of ever paying for or disposing of their lands to advantage, yet, if they cannot be permitted to relinquish a part of them upon equitable terms, the hope of some favorable occurrence—some auspicious turn of affairs, or more propitious fortune—will induce them to retain the whole of those lands, not only as long as the law now allows, but as long as the utmost indulgence of Congress (for which you will be constantly importuned) will permit.

So that you will ultimately have to compromise upon terms not better than those proposed, or to resort to the odious alternative of enforcing forfeitures, and taking from those people an immense sum of money, without rendering them the slightest equivalent for it. This, sir, would indeed be so much like a parent robbing his own children, and so repugnant to the best feelings of the human heart, as well as to all the maxims of justice, that it would be very difficult to persevere in it against the constant petitions of those people, backed and supported as they now are, and hereafter will be, by their respective States, whose influence, if it should bear any proportion to their rapidly increasing population, will not be altogether unavailing, in a just cause, some ten years hence.

Mr. President, depend upon it, sir, public sentiment never will, under the whole circumstances of the case, sanction the exaction of such forfeitures from the brave and patriotic defenders of our frontiers, when the necessity for them can be avoided without any real sacrifice, and upon such just and equitable terms. And, though the time may not yet have arrived, I am persuaded it is not distant when relief will be granted to those upon whom forfeitures have already been enforced. I confess that, for one, I am prepared to grant it at any time, believing, as I sincerely do, that, while liberality and justice recommend it, good policy does not forbid it, because it is as intrinsically wrong in a Government as it would be in an individual unnecessarily to take, or to keep, something for nothing. The sum forfeited is a serious punishment for so slight an indiscretion. The object of punishment itself is not vindictive. The necessity of example has ceased, since the law upon which it was intended to operate has been repealed; and the aggregate amount of those forfeitures is a serious loss to the Western country itself, which contributes so largely to the public revenue, and participates so little in the expenditure of public money. I therefore would not hesitate, particularly in times of such universal distress, which the Government has unquestionably contributed to produce, to grant to these persons certificates receivable in payment for public land, to the amount which they have respectively forfeited; whereby they would get only the value of their money, while the Government would not part with an acre of land for which it would not have received a full equivalent. But, be this as it may, the solicitude which the Western States now feel, and are most strongly manifesting upon this subject, as appears by the petitions now upon your table, sufficiently indicates that, unless suitable relief should be granted, you may annually expect petitions, memorials, and remonstrances, against all future forfeitures; and it is not to be doubted that nothing less than the most judicious management can prevent this enormous debt from becoming the fruitful source of much future difficulty and trouble, intermingling itself in all elections, and producing political effects which no one could regret more than myself.

I therefore trust that enough has been said to demonstrate the expediency of diminishing the debt, not only by permitting the relinquishment of a part of the land, but by offering just and proper inducements to make prompt payment for the balance.

This being a measure of sound policy, as well as of justice, its objects will be most effectually attained by making those inducements as liberal as the public interest will permit. And, as the success of the measure must depend upon the ability as well as the inclination of the debtors, they should not only be allowed suitable deductions to create the necessary incentives to make prompt payment, but reasonable time to render it practicable for them to do so.

I can see no difficulty in deciding what deduction ought, in sheer justice, to be made; for, if the Government, by the reduction of the price of its own lands, has imposed upon itself any equitable obligation whatever in favor of those debtors, (which all admit,) it is to allow them a deduction equal to the difference between the price contracted to be paid to the Government for those lands, and the value to which they have been reduced by the Government, which, whether considered in reference to the actual depreciation of the land, or appreciation of money, cannot be less than $37\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.; for the land heretofore sold at two dollars an acre will not now command more than the present minimum price, while the latter will purchase the same quantity of as good land as could heretofore have been purchased at the former minimum; and it would seem to be unreasonable, if not unjust, that the Government, having the power to do so, should, by its own act, reduce the land which it has heretofore sold, to a certain value, and yet demand more than that value of it.

With this view of the subject, and taking into consideration the difficulties and embarrassments of the present times, it appears to me to be both just and expedient to allow a deduction of $37\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to all who shall pay up on or before the 31st December next, without interest, and with interest to those who shall pay up at any time between that day and the 30th September, 1822; at which latter period, the indulgence for such as may be unable to avail themselves of those proffered inducements should commence. By these means, every cent that could be commanded for that purpose would be paid into your Treasury, and this awful subject would be finally put to rest.

Let it not be supposed that the success of the two first measures proposed will be, in the least degree, affected by the indulgence which is asked for those whose peculiar situation will prevent them from relinquishing their lands, and who may not be able to avail themselves of the proffered inducements to make prompt payments.

You have, in the personal interest of the debtors for public land, the most efficient guarantee against any such consequences, unless you can suppose that that energetic spring of human action has much less influence upon them than upon all the rest of mankind.

It has been correctly assumed by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report, that the extent of the national domain will, for ages, enable the Government to determine the price of unimproved land, similarly situated. The effects produced by the practical demonstration of such a power, in the reduction of the price of public land, and the quantity brought into market, as has been stated by my colleague, and as I have already endeavored to show, would of themselves be sufficient to induce a great majority of those debtors to surrender their lands, even though no relief whatever should be afforded them.

There can be no rational motive to induce them, under existing circumstances, to wish to keep unimproved lands, for which they could not make prompt payment upon the terms proposed. It would be madness itself to retain them for the purposes of speculation, since such an immense quantity of as good or better land can be purchased at a lower price; and therefore it may be fairly presumed that none would wish to avail themselves of the latter measure of relief, except such as have made improvements upon their lands, and may be unable, from the pressure of the present times, to make prompt payment. Those being the actual cultivators of the soil, the most needy, and at the same time the most meritorious and deserving of relief, will not relinquish their lands, though they may not be able to pay for them within the time prescribed by law—but they will rely upon your future mercy. The longer time you allow for the operation of the proposed inducements to make prompt payments, the more of them will be made, and the fewer of these cases will remain. Some, however, will necessarily still exist, and therefore such cases ought to be provided for at this time, so as to prevent the necessity of our having to legislate again upon the subject.

Mr. President, said Mr. E., were any reasoning wanting to prove that no system of coercion ought to be resorted to in less than two years, it is to be found in the late annual Treasury Report; for if, as is therein contended, the condition of the currency in several of the States in the Union; the exclusion from circulation in all the States west and south of the seat of Government, of the notes of the Bank of the United States and its branches; and there being no sound paper in circulation in several of those States, prove "that a resort to internal taxation, under such circumstances, would be to require of the citizens of those States what would be impossible for them to perform," and did last year, and do this year, justify a resort to loans to support the Government in a time of profound peace. If, I say, these circumstances are sufficient to prove the inability of the whole people of the United States to pay the amount of the loan of the last year, or the amount of the reported balance against the Treasury on the first day of the present year, a fortiori, they prove that the debtors for public land, being a part only of the population of a few of the very States in which those causes of embarrassment have operated, and continue to operate, most powerfully, must be utterly unable to pay the estimated sum that is proposed to be drawn from them, which is but little short of the amount of the loan of the last year, or the reported deficit in the revenue at the commencement of the present year.

Mr. President, said Mr. E., the population of the United States, I presume, may be safely estimated at ten millions; if so, the loan of last year would be at the rate of thirty cents for each one of our whole population; the amount of the balance against the Treasury at the commencement of the present year would require still less; but even supposing the loan to be seven millions of dollars, as proposed by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury, (and I flatter myself we shall not want half that amount,) it would only be at the rate of seventy cents each. And can it be conceded to be "impossible" for the whole population of the Union, or even that of the Southern and Western States in general, to pay at the rate of seventy cents each, and, at the same time, be supposed that a part of the population of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Mississippi, and two land districts in Missouri, with the few purchasers of public land which the present year may produce, will be able to pay two and a half millions of dollars, which is the sum estimated to be received from them?

There must, indeed, sir, be a fallacy in supposing that the whole people of the Union are unable to do so little, or that so considerable a part of our whole population will be able to do so much: and I hope you will not adopt the latter opinion in the present case, and the former one when we come to act upon the proposition for a loan, whatever may be the amount required; for I deem it all-important that we should not mistake in our estimate of what it is in the power of the debtors of public land to perform.

The debt of Alabama, divided among her white population, would not be less than one hundred and twenty dollars each, which, divided into ten annual instalments, would be twelve dollars per annum to be paid by each. Deduct one-half the debt, it would reduce the proportion, as before stated, to six dollars; but strike off three-fourths of the debt, (and, I presume, a greater reduction could not be safely calculated on,) it would still leave to be paid, for ten years in succession, at the rate of three dollars per annum for each one of her whole white population. And can it be supposed that Alabama, which has no sound paper circulation at all, is capable of doing more, and yet that it is impossible for the whole population of the Union to pay at the rate of seventy cents even for one year only? But I will not pursue the subject further.

I had, indeed, sir, intended to have availed myself much more at large of the reasoning and statements contained in the Treasury report; but the fatigue which I myself feel, admonishes me not to trespass longer upon the patience of the Senate, which I fear is already exhausted. Therefore, hoping that every member of this honorable body feels the importance of putting this momentous subject to rest, I will conclude by barely remarking that this truly desirable object can only be accomplished by duly considering what those debtors for public land are capable of performing, with reasonable exertions, and requiring no more of them: for, without this, they will be encouraged to petition you again and again; while you yourselves will not, cannot be inflexible, unless you should feel the most perfect conviction that you had done all, or rather more than ought to have been expected of you; and if, for the want of due liberality on the present occasion, it should become necessary to grant further relief at some future session of Congress, God only knows when the business will end. Were I to judge from what I have witnessed in a similar case, I should certainly suppose, not until a large majority of this House shall have taken their exit for another world. Therefore, as well to discourage and prevent future applications for relief, as to fortify your own determination to adhere to the measures you are now about to adopt, believe me, sir, it is better to require too little than too much.

When Mr. EDWARDS had concluded, the bill was laid on the table till to-morrow.

ROAD—MIAMI OF THE LAKE.

Mr. TRIMBLE communicated the following resolutions of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio; which were read:

"The committee, to whom was referred so much of the Governor's message as relates to the roads contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown, have had the same under consideration, and have collected all the information on that subject within their reach; and find that, on the 26th of January last, a select committee was appointed in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States, to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, further provisions were necessary to give effect to the provisions of the Treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan. That to that committee, the resolution on that subject, passed by the General Assembly of this State, at their last session, was referred, together with other documents on the same subject. That that committee, on the 12th day of May last, made a long and elaborate report, accompanied by a resolution, which resolution the committee have thought proper to transcribe, and make a part of this report, which is as follows, viz :

"Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to bring in a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to contract with any person or persons to construct a permanent and suitable road, to extend from the foot of the rapids of the Miami of the Lake, to the western line of the Connecticut Western Reserve, according to the plan contemplated by the Treaty of Brownstown; and, on such route passing through the reserve (so called) at Lower Sandusky, as the President may direct, in consideration of the whole of the tracts on each side of the contemplated road, which were granted by the Treaty of Brownstown, or so much thereof, as, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, may be adequate to the object. And in which bill shall also be inserted, among other things, a provision or provisions, that the person or persons so contracted with, do complete the said road within a reasonable time in said bill to be limited: That such person or persons do stipulate to keep said road in good repair for and during a number of years, to be in said bill defined; and, also, that the person or persons so contracted with, do also give bond, with sufficient sureties, for the faithful performance of his or their contract; and, also, a provision defining the time and manner in which the title to said land may be conveyed.

"The committee, from an examination of the report and resolution above alluded to, are of opinion, that the plan contemplated therein is the best, under existing circumstances, that can be devised. The committee would, therefore, recommend the adoption of the following resolution :

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That they do concur in the afore-mentioned report made, and resolution reported to the Congress of the United States: And that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their best endeavors to procure the passage of the law contemplated thereby.

"Resolved further, That the Governor of this State be, and he is hereby, requested to send a copy of the foregoing report and resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

RELIEF TO LAND PURCHASERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the purchasers of public lands prior to the first day of July, 1820; and, on motion by Mr. EATON, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands, with instructions to—

1st. Make the provisions of the bill applicable to those purchasers of public lands only who have purchased at public sale since the 30th day of December, 1816.

2d. And with instructions to extend the contemplated relief to none but those who, on or before the 30th day of October last, had made a settlement on the lands by them so purchased, defining and considering the settlement of any quarter section, a settlement of all contiguous and adjoining land, not exceeding two entire sections.

3d. And with instructions to extend the contemplated relief to no section on which any town may have been laid off, and the lots sold by any individual or company of individuals :

On motion by Mr. OTIS, the further consideration of the bill was postponed to Monday next.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate took up the bill reported by the Committee on Finance, to amend the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, (proposing penal enactments against violations of their trust by officers of the bank or its branches; and authorizing the appointment of two officers to sign the notes of the bank, instead of the president and cashier.)

JANUARY, 1821.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

Mr. SANFORD laid before the Senate, in a speech of some length, the views which operated on the Committee on Finance in recommending this bill; the reasons in favor of its provisions, and those which induced the committee not to recommend the other two objects petitioned for by the bank.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend the bill by adding thereto the following sections:

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the offices of discount and deposite of the said bank, excepting those of the office in the District of Columbia, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, only in the States and Territories in which they are made payable, and in the States and Territories in which no office of discount and deposite shall be established; any thing in the fourteenth section of the act incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That all notes of the denomination of five dollars, issued either by the bank or any of its offices of discount and deposite, made payable on demand, shall be receivable at the bank or any of its offices: And provided, further, That it shall not be lawful for the directors of the said bank to establish more than one office of discount and deposite in any State, without the consent of the Legislature thereof first had and obtained.

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That so much of the second and fourteenth fundamental article of the constitution of said bank, contained in the eleventh section of the act incorporating the subscribers thereto, as provides that no director of the said bank or any of its offices of discount and deposite, shall hold his office more than three years out of four in succession, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 5. Be it further enacted, That the directors of the said corporation shall cause a list of the stockholders of the said bank, together with their places of residence, to be kept in the banking house, at Philadelphia, open to the inspection of any and every stockholder of said bank, who may apply for the same within hours of business, for at least ninety days previously to every annual election of directors; and no person who may be entitled to vote at any election for directors of said bank, as attorney, proxy, or agent, for any other person, copartnership, or body politic, shall, as such, give a greater number than — votes, under any pretence whatsoever; and no letter of proxy shall be of any force or effect longer than — years, or until it shall have been revoked.

SEC. 6. Be it further enacted, That, whenever the said corporation assent to the provisions of this act, and certify such assent to the Secretary of the Treasury Department, by writing, duly authenticated, this act shall be of full force and effect, and not otherwise.

Some debate ensuing on this proposition, as well as on the bill itself, a motion prevailed to postpone the bill to Wednesday, that the amendment might be printed; and the bill was postponed accordingly.

Mr. SANFORD, having laid before the Senate sundry papers connected with the subject of this bill, which had been communicated to the Committee on Finance by the Bank of the United States, to enforce the expediency of granting the objects prayed for in their memorial—

Mr. OTIS moved that these papers be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BARBOUR moved that all the papers submitted to the Committee on Finance by the bank be printed.

[This motion was understood, by the debate which ensued on it, to refer to a particular paper which had been communicated to the committee by the bank, with a request that it might be received confidentially; which paper is understood to contain a statement of frauds committed on the bank, and the names of those persons or officers who committed them.]

A good deal of discussion took place on this motion, and many gentlemen entered into it. The debate turned principally on the propriety of making public information of this personal character, which had been confidentially communicated to a committee of the body to whom the subject had been referred, simply to show the expediency of granting to the bank the security of penal sanctions against violations of trust by its officers, and the reason which existed for asking of Congress this additional guard against such treacherous spoliations, some gentlemen being in favor of making the information public, as a just punishment of the offenders, and a warning to the world against them; and others being opposed to disclosing it, under the circumstances in which it came to the knowledge of the Senate. In the course of the debate, it appeared that the document was not now in possession of the committee, and part of the discussion referred to the propriety of taking measures to obtain it, the proper mode of proceeding with that object, &c. The debate was terminated by a motion by Mr. SMITH to postpone the subject to Monday, with the view of then submitting a resolution on the subject; and the subject was postponed—ayes 21; and the Senate adjourned to Monday.

Resolved, That the fines collected under that act ought to be restored to those from whom they were exacted; and that these resolutions be recommitted to the committee who brought them in, with instructions to report a bill to that effect.

The resolutions having been read, Mr. BARBOUR rose in support of them, and spoke about two hours; when (not having finished his argument) he gave way for a motion to postpone the subject until to-morrow; which prevailed.

“Resolved, That the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

“JOSEPH RICHARDSON,

“JANUARY 1, 1821.”

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Missouri, representing the injurious operation of the act of Congress, requiring prompt payment for the public lands, on the actual settlers thereon, submitted the following report:

That, by an act of Congress, of the 12th April 1814, every person, or the legal representative of every person, who had actually inhabited and cultivated a tract of land lying in the Missouri Territory, which tract was not rightfully claimed by any other person, and who had not removed from the said Territory, was entitled to a preference in becoming the purchaser from the United States of such tract of land, at private sale, at the same price and on the same terms and conditions, in every respect, as were or might be provided by law for the sale of other lands sold at private sale in said Territory at the time of making such purchase, under other restrictions prescribed by the said act. The committee are of opinion that, inasmuch as the right of pre-emption was granted to those settlers upon the express condition that the lands should be paid for on the same terms and conditions in every respect, that were or might be provided by law for the sale of their lands sold at private sale, in said Territory, at the time of making the purchase; and, moreover, as, by the act requiring prompt payment, the minimum price of the public land is reduced from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents an acre, they have no just cause of complaint; and therefore recommend that the prayer of the memorialists be rejected.

The report was taken up and concurred in by the Senate.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion made on Friday, by Mr. SANFORD, to print sundry papers connected with, or illustrative of, the bill reported by the Committee of Finance to amend the charter of the Bank of the United States—Mr. BARBOUR’s motion to print all the papers communicated by the bank to the committee (including the private statement of frauds and the names of the defrauders) being the first question for decision.

Mr. BARBOUR’s motion was negatived, and the original motion was agreed to.

The Senate then took up the resolution offered by Mr. SMITH, on Monday, to call on the president of the bank for a list, as far as it could be furnished, of all frauds committed on the bank by any of its officers, the names of the defrauders, at what offices committed, the facilities possessed by the officers for committing them, &c.

On motion of Mr. SANFORD, the resolution was amended by adding a request for “a statement of the number of bank notes issued by the bank, signed by the president and countersigned by the cashier thereof, of every different amount or denomination; and also a statement of the amount of notes heretofore issued and made payable at the principal bank, and the amount of notes made payable at the different offices.”

The question being then put on the resolution as amended, it was decided in the negative, and the resolution rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted the following motion for consideration:

The bill further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes; and also, the bill for the relief of General Robert Swartwout, were severally read the second time.

ROADS AND CANALS.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. TRIMBLE, on the 15th inst., which is in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing by law the employment of the topographical engineers, in surveying, under the direction of the President of the United States, canals to connect the navigable waters between Boston harbor, in the State of Massachusetts, and Pamlico Sound, in the State of North Carolina, in such direction and on such plan as will best promote the interest, and the military and naval defence of the United States.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend it by adding thereto the following:

"And a military and post road from some part of the Penobscot river, in the State of Maine, to the Schodiack river, in said State, on the Eastern line of the United States."

Mr. CHANDLER made a few remarks in support of his proposed amendment, to show how necessary such a road is to the military defence of that part of the Union, &c.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, seconded his colleague, adding, as a further reason in favor of the measure, that, as far as the line had been run under the fifth article of the Treaty of Ghent, it was found to include a much more extensive portion of territory than was supposed to belong to the United States in that quarter.

Mr. TRIMBLE said he had no further objection to the amendment than that it embraced an object totally distinct from the original proposition, and which should therefore be separately proposed.

To which Mr. CHANDLER replied, that, though the objects were geographically distinct, the power to be exercised in regard to both was the same, and the inquiry as to both was properly referable to the same committee.

The amendment of Mr. CHANDLER was agreed to, as was the resolution as amended.

MATTHEW LYON.

The Senate then again proceeded to the consideration of the report of the select committee in the case of Matthew Lyon.

Mr. OTIS rose, and, in a speech of considerable length, delivered his views in opposition to the report.

MATTHEW LYON.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the petition of Matthew Lyon, together with the motion to postpone the same indefinitely.

Mr. DICKERSON, of New Jersey, rose, and expressed himself as follows:

In addressing the Senate upon the subject of the resolutions for the relief of Matthew Lyon, I shall, said Mr. D., make some preliminary observations upon a few remarks that fell from the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. OTIS,) which seem not intended as any solid part of his argument, but were introduced by way of embellishment to his very ingenious and very eloquent speech.

The honorable gentleman seems much annoyed by the thunders from the West, and the roaring of the lion.

By the thunders from the West, I understand the torrent of eloquence which we have heard with delight from the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. TALBOT.) That thunder, sir, was not a mere brutum fulmen; it was a succession of electric shocks, attended with the most vivid lightnings. Such thunder tends to purify the political atmosphere, and to invigorate our languid systems.

The honorable gentleman says, the lion will come again, and, if he does, he will heed him not, but say, encore, let him roar, once more. Sir, the lion will come again and again, unless we restore him the money we have taken from him; but, give him that, and then, if I may borrow a line from Pyramus and Thisbe, as that gentleman has done—and he always keeps within the pale of senatorial decorum—give him the money, and then he will roar you as gently as any sucking dove. And this, I am confident, would be the cheaper way of getting rid of him. I have other reasons for believing it would be the better way.

The honorable gentleman conducted the correspondence between himself and one of his constituents, with great address, and brought it to a happy conclusion; which is the less to be wondered at, as he managed on both sides, and composed the answer as well as the letter. But, when he informed his correspondent that the case of Matthew Lyon was obtruded upon our notice, at a time when we were crowded with a great variety of important business, I wish he had added, by way of postscript, that the Senate had adjourned from Friday to the Monday following, every week this session, except one, and then I think there would be a postscript to the answer, that, on the score of want of time, or press of business, there could be no excuse for refusing to hear the case of Matthew Lyon. In which opinion I most heartily concur.

The honorable gentleman seems to doubt as to the numbers said to have been arrayed against the sedition act. There were eighteen thousand petitioners against that act, from Pennsylvania alone, and several thousands from other States; but before that Congress, this multitude were as grasshoppers, and their noise was as the chirping of grasshoppers.

The honorable gentleman informs us, that the grasshoppers in the field make more noise than the beasts which graze the pasture. I understand the application, but the figure is an unfortunate one, notwithstanding it has the authority of Mr. Burke for its support. Surely Mr. Burke could never have heard the tremendous bellowsings of the lordly leader of the herd, or the nasal, harsh, ear-rending note of one of the descendants of Sancho's Dapple. Why, sir, a single jack will bray more noise in a minute than could be made in the same time by all the grasshoppers that ever hopped. Believe me, it was an egregious error to mistake the voice of the people for the chirping of grasshoppers.

The honorable gentleman thinks that most of us must have been too young in 1798, to have formed accurate opinions of the transactions of that time, insinuating that those who were not young then must be old now. Whether I was old enough then, or even now, to form accurate opinions of the transactions of that time, is not so certain; but I have perfect recollection of what happened then, within the sphere of my own observation. I have a painful recollection that my mind was irritated, my indignation excited, my passions roused, by what I thought a systematic attempt to impair the liberties of my country. But time cures all things. In twenty years I have cooled down to what my former associates think much below the temperate point, and, even on the measure now before the Senate, the propriety or expediency of which I never doubted, I have embarked with great reluctance, as those know who first presented the petition of Matthew Lyon. I do not wish to throw Congreve rockets into the ranks of this corps of invalids, as the gentleman chooses to designate himself and friends. I do not wish to revive the feuds of 1798; but I did hope that, at this time, when we are all federalists, all republicans; when not a breath disturbs the harmony of this amalgamation, the good feelings which we perceive every day would not be exercised exclusively on one side, but that there would be some degree of reciprocity; that, as that gentleman allows that the sedition act was inexpedient, and had been pronounced to be so by the people, it was also hoped, that the punishing of Matthew Lyon under the act would be deemed inexpedient; that it would be deemed inexpedient to raise money by such means; that it would be deemed inexpedient to retain moneys thus raised, in our Treasury, and therefore that it would be deemed quite expedient to return the moneys thus obtained; or, at least, it was hoped that no very determined opposition would be given to this measure. But so far from this, the honorable gentleman admonishes us not to press him and those with whom he acts; not to irritate them, for, although nobody was disposed to attack the present administration, comparisons might be made; comparisons of the expenses of former times, with those of the present; expenses of the war, with the advantages gained by it. Besides, our political concerns were not of the most flattering kind; there was a great deficit in our revenue; our foreign relations were not in the most prosperous train; some troubles with France. This, to be sure, is not threatening, but looks a little like it. For one, I do not fear, but rather court, such comparisons; for, if the results of such comparisons should sometimes turn out unfavorably to those who have the expenditure of public moneys, or of those who authorize those expenditures, it would operate as an excellent corrective; it might do much good, but no hurt.

I regret that the merits or demerits of Matthew Lyon should be called up in deciding a principle, involving consequences much more important than the character or sufferings of any individual. I am aware that Matthew Lyon is unpopular in Congress, but that want of popularity should have no unfavorable effect in fixing a principle in which the citizens of the United States are deeply interested. We are not to try the man; we are to decide his cause, which is one of general interest. Why, we are triumphantly asked by the honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. WALKER) has this question been suffered to sleep for twenty years? Why are its slumbers now disturbed? Frequent attempts have been made to disturb its slumbers, but in vain; an attempt is now made, but that gentleman seems resolved to perpetuate those slumbers, by this motion for indefinite postponement. Perhaps there have been in Congress too many who believe, with that gentleman, that no injury has been done to Matthew Lyon; who think that the eulogiums which have been bestowed upon him, have been a sufficient compensation for his sufferings; for eulogiums have been poured out upon him in great profusion, from the time he became an object of persecution. If he could be paid for his sufferings in this way, he might be overpaid; and it may be thought that, upon a fair reckoning, there may be found a balance against Mr. Lyon, and that it would be but fair that he should suffer a little more; but, trust me, that honorable gentleman, who seems to envy the happy estate of Mr. Lyon, would not suffer what he did for all the eulogiums which fame herself, with her hundred trumpets, could pour out upon him for the rest of his life.

But why, says the honorable gentleman, is this time, when our Treasury is empty, selected for voting money to Mr. Lyon—why was not this done in the time of Mr. Jefferson's Administration, when we had an overflowing Treasury—and we were at a loss for the means of disposing of the public money? In the first place, there was really not so much difficulty in disposing of the public money as seems to be imagined—emptying the Treasury was a very simple business then, as we have found it to be in latter days. In the next place, a full Treasury was no good reason for paying M. Lyon a thousand dollars then, any more than a bare Treasury is, for withholding it now. The merits of the case do not depend on the state of the Treasury; if they did, those merits would sometimes be very great, at other times very small, but generally rather small. I trust, however, in voting on this resolution, we shall not stop to inquire how much money there may be in the Treasury; if we do, sure I am, the gentleman's motion, the indefinite postponement, must prevail.

If the friends of the liberty of the press have heretofore neglected to urge this subject upon the consideration of Congress, let the reproach rest with them; their apathy affords no apology to us for refusing to act. If we have been negligent, let us now redeem our character. Those who consider the sedition act constitutional, and called for by the circumstances of the times, must consider this inquiry as altogether unnecessary and improper—and those who believe that the act was unconstitutional and oppressive, I fear, feel satisfied that much good has resulted to themselves from the sufferings of those who were fined and imprisoned under that act—and that the party with whom it originated, not only failed to accomplish the object they had in view, but in fact by this very measure lost the power which it was intended to perpetuate. Under such comfortable, but selfish reflections, I fear we are disposed to forget the victims of the law.

We cannot but feel some reluctance at entering upon the investigation of a question, which, by many, has long been considered at rest; more especially when that question is calculated to call up feelings that once painfully agitated the public mind. Under such circumstances, a love of ease will prevail, where a strong sense of duty does not impel to action.

The present case, however, comes before us, in a way that demands, and must receive a serious consideration. One of our citizens has brought his claim before us in the usual form of petition. The Constitution, laws, and usages, by which this body is governed, make it imperative upon us to decide for or against the petitioner; and whatever gentlemen may think, as to the merits of the individual, his case involves consequences of the highest importance, such as cannot be decided but with great responsibility, a responsibility which I trust will insure a correct decision.

Some who think the sedition act unconstitutional may be of opinion that it is not necessary, nor even consistent with the dictates of sound policy, after a lapse of twenty years, to relieve the sufferers under that law. With such it will remain to devise a better mode of restoring and reviving, as far as it can be done by Congress, the first article of the amendments to the Constitution, which was practically suspended by the sedition act, and which may be considered as null and void if the constitutionality of the act shall now receive the sanction of Congress.

If it were known with absolute certainty that a result, similar to that which attended the passing of the sedition act, would inevitably attend every similar attempt—that part of our Constitution which respects the liberty of the press would remain secure from further violation. But, such a result is by no means certain—and we deceive ourselves if we suppose that the rage and fury of party are no more to prevail in this country.

Should an attempt hereafter be made to revive the sedition law, Constitutional objections would have but little avail, as coming too late. It would be said the sedition act of ninety-eight was not repealed, although every effort was made to procure its repeal, expressly on Constitutional grounds. It was suffered to expire by its own limitation. Its constitutionality was sanctioned by two decisions of Congress; and those decisions corroborated by all the force which the judiciary could give them.

If those who raised their voice from one extremity of the Union to the other against the constitutionality of this act, when it was passed, and when an attempt was made to repeal it, will not now, when they have the power, make an effort to repair the breach in the Constitution, it will be yielding the point, and acknowledging that all their clamor was raised to gain power, which they did gain; not to preserve the Constitution, which is left mutilated, without an effort at reparation. And this precedent, thus sanctioned by one party and acquiesced in by the other, will be considered as the legislative and judicial construction of the Constitution; and, by this process, the Constitution will practically be altered, and the liberty of the press be as completely within the control of Congress and the Judiciary of the United States, as if the first amendment to the Constitution had declared Congress shall have power to abridge the liberty of the press.

For my part, I have never doubted that the sedition act, so far as it respects the printing and publishing of libels, was a direct, open, and unequivocal breach of the Constitution. And, although I do not hold the United States responsible for all the losses sustained under that act, I would not willingly retain in our Treasury a single dollar of the money iniquitously acquired under it. The whole forms but a small sum, but if it were large, it should be returned to those from whom it was taken. I should not stop to inquire whether it was a thousand or a hundred thousand dollars.

The friends of the sedition act aver that it was no breach of the Constitution—no infringement, but rather an enlargement of the liberty of the press. It ought, they say, to be considered:

1st. Mitigating the rigor of the common law on the subject of libels, inasmuch as it limits the punishment under it to two thousand dollars fine and two years' imprisonment, and allows the truth to be given in evidence, while those guilty of the same offences might be punished at common law, by fine and imprisonment, at the discretion of the court.

2d. That it is merely declaratory of the common law, making nothing penal that was not penal before.

3d. That it did not abridge the liberty of the press, inasmuch as it imposed no previous restraint upon publications—established no censorship or system of licensing.

4th. That it was necessary for carrying into effect the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government, and, therefore, required under the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution.

5th. That it was a part of a system of national defence, adopted at a crisis of extraordinary difficulty and danger.

Most of those arguments we have heard upon this floor, and all of them are contained in a very celebrated report of a committee of the House of Representatives, made on the 21st of February, 1799, in which report the committee condensed whatever they supposed could be urged in favor of the sedition act, and against its repeal. This received the sanction of the House of Representatives, and was published in many journals of the day as proof positive of the unerring wisdom of Congress.

It was to be hoped that the dangerous doctrine that the common law was the prop and support of the sedition act, would long since have been formally abandoned, but I see nothing like it. The honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, two years ago, when the subject was under discussion, did say, in justification of the sedition act, that every Government had an inherent right to punish offences which endanger its existence—which sentiment he now reiterates. Such rights, if not derived from the Constitution, must be derived from the broad principles of the common law—such principles as were assumed by the committee in their celebrated report. He seems to have abated nothing in his reverence for the common law; he considers the stigma cast upon it by gentlemen, particularly by gentlemen of the bar, as a species of profanation. The eulogium he has pronounced upon this common law is such as to leave no doubt as to his opinion that it ought to be ingrafted upon our system, if it does not already form the vital part of it. He informs us that the common law, I quote his words, is a system in which, under God, we live, and move, and have our being.

Was the sedition act passed in mitigation of the common law? If it was, it will conclusively follow that the press was more free during the existence of that act than it was before it passed, or has been since it expired. And that period, which has been called the reign of terror, should be recorded and remembered as the golden days of the publishers of pamphlets and newspapers.

In investigating a proposition so extraordinary as this, we are led to inquire into the motives of those by whose means the act passed. Why should the party in power, who had everything to fear from the press at this time of difficulty and danger, pertinaciously insist upon mitigating the rigor of the law upon the subject of libels, while those for whom all this kindness was meant as pertinaciously refused to receive the boon? Had the Legislatures of any of the States instructed their Senators and Representatives to obtain any such mitigation of the common law? Had the printers asked this as a favor? Had any meetings of the citizens presented memorials to Congress upon this subject? Had the cries of any convicted for libels, and sentenced to a fine of more than two thousand dollars, and imprisonment more than two years, moved the tender mercies of the majority in Congress? Nothing of all this appears upon the record.

If this act was in truth meant to extend the liberty of the press, these publishers of pamphlets and newspapers have been guilty of the vilest ingratitude towards their benefactors. For, so far from puffing them in their publications, or toasting them at their feasts, or giving them dinners for their patriotic exertions, they have poured out upon them innumerable streams of invective, which, with the aid of some other causes, not necessary to be detailed, have deprived them of the power of further mitigating the rigor of the common law.

But I believe the charge of ingratitude will not lie against these publishers of pamphlets and newspapers. They judged correctly, and some of them know by sad experience the exact nature of the good things intended for them by the dominant party in Congress.

If Congress by this act meant to mitigate the rigor of the common law, they most certainly missed their aim. But I hope it will not be thought uncharitable to suspect that nothing was further from their intention. If such was indeed their intention, it should have appeared in the bill; the evils to be remedied should have been pointed out, and such parts of the common law as were deemed too severe should have been expressly abrogated; otherwise the courts might have gone on to indict and punish offenders at common law, the sedition act notwithstanding, and in this way have entirely defeated the benevolent intentions of Congress.

But Congress should have been very sure that they had this common law before they undertook to mitigate it.

How far can the sedition act be considered as declaratory of the common law?

If it is declaratory of the common law of England, and not of this country, it is idle, as much so as if it was declaratory of the common law of France or China.

It is impossible that it could be declaratory of the common law of the individual States, for the laws upon the subject of libels were not probably alike in any two of them. And Congress never stopped to inquire whether, in all the States, authors of libels upon the Government of the United States were punishable by fine and imprisonment, at common law, whether any had been punished for such offences to an extent beyond two thousand dollars fine and two years imprisonment; and, if so, whether the States might not have been left to mitigate their own common law.

If the State courts had power to punish at common law, or any other law, those guilty of the offences mentioned in the sedition act, that act did not take away such power, and the offenders might have been punished both in the State and Federal courts; for, in such a strange complexity of jurisdictions, the plea of autre fois acquit would not have been available on the second indictment, more especially as one prosecution would be for an offence against the State, the other for an offence against the United States. Such a divided empire in matter of jurisdiction cannot be tolerated. If Congress have power to provide for the punishment of the offences mentioned in the sedition act, they must have the exclusive power, uncontrolled by the States. For, if the States have such control, they might mitigate the rigor of the sedition act, by providing that the punishment for offences mentioned in that act should be merely nominal, and thus render that act inoperative, except in the District of Columbia.

The United States and individual States can have no concurrent jurisdiction in the trial of criminal prosecutions. If the United States have jurisdiction in such cases, it must be exclusive jurisdiction. And Congress cannot declare what is the law of the States; the States must be left to declare for themselves.

If, therefore, the sedition act was declaratory of any common law, it must have been the common law of the United States. The United States, it will be allowed, could have had no common law from immemorial usage. If they had it at all, it must have been by adoption. But, where do we find, in the Constitution, the power to adopt the common law as a part of our criminal code? With such a power, the Constitution itself would never have been adopted. That such a power exists, is a doctrine the most extraordinary and the most dangerous that has ever been urged in Congress or in our courts of justice.

Yet the committee who made the celebrated report I have already mentioned declare that "the act in question (sedition act) cannot be unconstitutional, because it makes nothing penal that was not penal before; gives no new powers to the courts, but is merely declaratory of the common law; libels against the Government are offences arising under the Constitution, (second section of the third article,) and consequently punishable at common law by the courts of the United States."

This report has been sanctioned by a vote of a majority of the House of Representatives, and by an acquiescence on the part of the then minority of more than twenty years. And yet, if the committee were right, the same common law still exists, and the Federal courts can now take cognizance of the offences mentioned in the sedition act, and try the offenders without allowing them the privilege of giving the truth in evidence, for Mr. Fox's bill can form no part of the common law, and punish them by fine and imprisonment at their discretion. Can we tolerate such doctrines? Will we now by our decision give currency and effect to such damnable heresies?

The discussion upon this point alone would form a long argument. Whatever can be said upon it has been said by Mr. Madison and other members of the Virginia Legislature in their debates upon this subject, which have been published. For the present, I will satisfy myself with quoting the opinion of Judge Chase, in the case of the United States against Worral, 2 Dallas's rep. 398. In the term of April, 1798, three months before the passing of the sedition act, the defendant was tried and convicted at common law, in the circuit court for the Pennsylvania district, for an attempt to bribe Tench Coxe, the commissioner of the revenue. A motion was made in arrest of judgment, and it was alleged that the circuit court could not take cognizance of this offence, inasmuch as it was not a crime against any of the statute laws of the United States, and that the common law could give no jurisdiction to the court in this case.

Chase, Justice: "This is an indictment for an offence highly injurious to morals, and deserving the severest punishment; but, as it is an indictment at common law, I dismiss at once every thing that has been said about the Constitution and laws of the United States." "In my opinion, the United States, as a Federal Government, have no common law; and, consequently, no indictment can be maintained in their courts for offences merely at the common law. If, indeed, the United States can be supposed for a moment to have a common law, it must, I presume, be that of England; and yet it is impossible to trace when or how the system was adopted or introduced."

The Judge supported this opinion by sound argument, but not such as to convince his brother Peters, who dissented.

Peters, Justice: "Whenever a Government has been established, I have always supposed that a power to preserve itself was a necessary and inseparable concomitant. But the existence of the Federal Government would be precarious; it could no longer be called an independent Government, if, for the punishment of offences of this nature, tending to obstruct and pervert the administration of its affairs, an appeal must be made to the State tribunals, or the offenders must escape with absolute impunity."

"The power to punish misdemeanors is originally and strictly a common law power; of which I think the United States are constitutionally possessed. It might have been exercised by Congress as a legislative act; but it may also, in my opinion, be enforced in a course of judicial proceeding. Whenever an offence aims at the subversion of any federal institution, or at the corruption of its public officers, it is an offence against the well-being of the United States. From its very nature, it is cognizable under their authority, and consequently is within the jurisdiction of this court, by virtue of the eleventh section of the judicial act."

If this opinion was correct, then, indeed, Congress had nothing further to do in a criminal code, but to soften the rigor of the common law. I must call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the extraordinary termination of this case. The court being divided, the motion in arrest of judgment failed; but, being so divided, it became a matter of doubt whether sentence could be pronounced upon the defendant. Those doubts were removed, I know not how, and the defendant sentenced to an imprisonment of three months and a fine of two hundred dollars; and thus was punished at common law, the opinion of Judge Chase to the contrary notwithstanding.

These opinions, thus judicially expressed, must have been well known to the majority in Congress who passed the sedition act, and well known to the committee who drew up the celebrated report, and to the majority in the House of Representatives who sanctioned that report; and they have given all the validity which they possibly could to the broad and sweeping doctrine of the common law under which Worrall was punished. Further comment, as to this point, is unnecessary.

It is said that the sedition act is no abridgment of the liberty of the press, inasmuch as it imposes no previous restraint upon publications—establishes no censorship, or system of licensing.

And can we admit that no law can abridge the liberty of the press, unless it subject publications to a system of licensing? Did the first amendment to the Constitution mean only to provide against such a system? A system which no administration in England has dared to enforce since the time of William III. A system that would no sooner be tolerated in this country than would the holy inquisition. A system against which it would be wholly useless to provide by the Constitution. For, whenever Congress shall be so utterly lost to every principle of liberty as to wish for such a system, be assured no Constitution will stand in their way. Some pretext will easily be found for prostrating the liberty of the press, by some new and more rigid sedition act. If all other pretexts should fail, that of introducing it as a part of the system of national defence will be deemed satisfactory.

If a law to punish the authors of libels with a fine of two thousand dollars and an imprisonment of two years be not to abridge the liberty of the press, because it imposes no previous restraint upon publications, then, by a parity of reasoning, to punish with ten thousand dollars fine and ten years' imprisonment would be no abridgment of the liberty of the press. No, not even if the offence should be made capital, as was done under Augustus Cæsar.

The importance of a free press in preventing the abuses of Government, was well understood at the adoption of the Constitution and its amendments, and much more justly appreciated than now. And such was the extreme jealousy of the people upon this subject, that, although no power was given to Congress to interfere with the liberty of the press, and all powers not given were reserved, yet, fearing that Congress might, by implication, arrogate this power to themselves, they provided this prohibitory amendment, that Congress should not abridge the liberty of the press.

If, in consequence of passing the sedition act, it was more dangerous to investigate and expose the abuses of Government, than it was before the act passed, then was the liberty of the press abridged.

To subject the publisher of what might be deemed a libel, to punishment by indictment, when before he was only answerable in damages to the party injured; or to be tried in two courts when before he could be tried but in one; or to be tried in a court in which he could not be tried before, is to increase the hazard and danger of such publication. But to make him, for an alleged libel on the President and Senate of the United States indictable before judges appointed by the President and Senate; by a grand jury chosen by a marshal, and before a traverse jury selected by the same marshal, holding his office at the pleasure of the President; the prosecution to be urged by the zeal of a district attorney, also holding his office at the will of the President; is so far a restraint upon the liberty of the press, that none but the most intrepid would dare to arraign the conduct of the President before the bar of the public.

But the practice under this act, whatever was intended by it, was made to produce the effect of previous restraint. A person charged with publishing a libel against the provisions of this act, would be bound under recognizance, himself in a thousand dollars, and two good sureties in a thousand more, to appear and answer; and also to keep the peace and be of good behavior. If, before the session of the court, he publishes that Congress have passed an unconstitutional act, this, by the vigilant prosecuting officer, would be deemed a new libel and a forfeiture of the former recognizance. The offending party would be bound over again, with sureties, to appear and answer, and also to keep the peace and be of good behavior—and suits immediately commenced on the first recognizance against the party and his sureties; and so on toties quoties, till the party would be silent. This is not merely hypothesis, but matter of fact. Two suits were depending against the editor of the Aurora and his sureties, on recognizances thus forfeited, when Mr. Jefferson came into office; I need hardly add that, soon after this, they were discontinued, and thus was Mr. Duane saved from serious embarrassment, if not ruin, and his sureties from heavy losses. It was generally a part of the sentence on conviction, that the party should find surety for his good behavior for a limited time. Those who were intrepid enough to meet the consequences of such a process in their own property and persons, were not willing to expose their friends to vexatious lawsuits and ruinous losses. They would, therefore, be as much restrained as they would be under a law requiring a license for publication—nay, more so, for any one could publish without license, subjecting himself to the penalty of the law, in which case he would not be punished through his friends; a kind of punishment much more mortifying to a man of an ingenuous mind, than fine or imprisonment in his own person. What could—what did prevent a total prostration of the liberty of the press, under such a system?—Public opinion; a tribunal which I hope no party or administration in this country will ever be able to put at defiance; a tribunal which has pronounced on this law, and the makers of it.

To ascertain how far this act was an abridgment of the liberty of the press, let us examine a little further into its practical operation. It is unnecessary to add any thing to what has already been said upon the trial of Matthew Lyon. The trial of Thomas Cooper, in 1800, in the Circuit Court of the United States, for the Pennsylvania District, will furnish a complete illustration of the views of those who made, and of those who administered this law.

I select this case because I was a witness of the whole trial: a trial which, at the time, filled my mind with horror and indignation. I saw a man whom it was my pride then, as it is now, to call my friend; a man of the most honorable feelings; a man whose name is identified with science and literature; the constant study of whose life it has been to render himself useful to his fellow beings; I saw this man dragged before a criminal court, arraigned, tried, and punished, for publishing words which nothing but the violence and blindness of party rage could have construed into crime. In the year '97 Mr. Cooper had asked of the President, Mr. Adams, to be appointed an agent for American claims; the request was made through Dr. Priestley directly to Mr. Adams, with a frankness warranted on the part of the Doctor by the intimacy which had long existed between them. As the application was thus personal, it was supposed to be confidential. It was unsuccessful, and there it should have rested. But, by some means never explained, two years afterwards this application was made public, and afforded the editor of a paper in Reading, an opportunity of inserting a scurrilous paragraph against Mr. Cooper. Irritated at being thus held up as a subject of ridicule, Mr. Cooper, in justification of his own conduct, published the address for which he was indicted. The words contained in the indictment, stripped of the innuendoes, are the following:

“Nor do I see any impropriety in making this request of Mr. Adams: at that time he had just entered into office; he was hardly in the infancy of political mistake; even those who doubted of his capacity, thought well of his intentions. Nor were we yet saddled with the expense of a permanent navy, or threatened, under his auspices, with the existence of a standing army. Our credit was not yet reduced quite so low as to borrow money at eight per cent. in time of peace, while the unnecessary violence of official expressions might justly have provoked a war. Mr. Adams had not yet projected his embassies to Prussia, Russia, and the Sublime Porte; nor had he yet interfered, as President of the United States, to influence the decisions of a court of justice; a stretch of authority which the monarch of Great Britain would have shrunk from; an interference without precedent, against law, and against mercy! The melancholy case of Jonathan Robbins, a native citizen of America, forcibly impressed by the British, and delivered up, with the advice of Mr. Adams, to the mock trial of a British court martial, had not yet astonished the republican citizens of this free country; a case too little known, but which the people ought to be fully apprized of before the election, and they shall be.”

I have the highest veneration for the exalted statesman and revolutionary patriot against whom this censure was levelled; but he was not infallible—much less so were those around him, by whose advice, at this particular period, he was too much influenced. But, however exalted his station, he had accepted it with a full knowledge that it was the disposition and practice, and a salutary one too, in this country, to examine and censure, with great freedom, the conduct of those in power. To be censured freely, and sometimes unjustly, is a tax which every one must pay who holds the highest station in our Government. Laws which should completely prevent this, would as completely prostrate the liberties of the people.

SENATE.

Case of Matthew Lyon.

JANUARY, 1821.

However much Mr. Adams might have been hurt at the asperity of the language applied to him, I am confident he never intimated a wish in favor of a prosecution. Most probably this took place in consequence of the advice of those who advised that Robbins should be given up. About this time Mr. Adams thought proper to repress the zeal of his political friends by pardoning Fries, who had been guilty of a misdemeanor, but was convicted of treason, and by other acts evincing a disposition to pursue a more moderate system than that which had prevailed for two preceding years. It will also be remembered, that, not long after this period, he dismissed some of his advisers, in whom he had probably placed too much confidence.

At the present time of good feelings it seems incredible, that what Mr. Cooper said of the expenses of a permanent navy—of the standing army—the eight per cent. loan, and the projected embassies to Prussia, Russia, and the Sublime Porte, should have been considered as the subject of indictment. What was said as to the case of Jonathan Robbins, otherwise called Thomas Nash, was of a more serious character, and should have been answered, if it could have been answered, by a true history of that transaction—not by punishing Mr. Cooper; for, if this interference on the part of the President, was without precedent against law and against mercy, fining and imprisoning Mr. Cooper could not make it otherwise.

It has never been pretended that there was any precedent for delivering up Robbins. He had been charged with piracy and murder on board the British sloop Hermione, and demanded by the British minister. His case was depending before Judge Bee, of South Carolina. He alleged that he was a native citizen of the United States, and that he had been forcibly impressed on board the Hermione. If his story had been true, it will not be pretended by those who recollect the history connected with that transaction that he ought to have been given up. But, as he averred it to be true, and produced his passport under the authority of the United States, in support of his assertion, the proof that he stated a falsehood should have been so complete as to leave no loop to hang a doubt upon, before he should ever have been given up to certain death. The proof, if it deserves the name, was of a very doubtful character as to this point. While the case was thus before the Judge, Mr. Pickering, then Secretary of State, wrote a letter to the Judge, containing, among others, this expression:

"The President has, in consequence hereof, authorized me to communicate to you his advice and request that Thomas Nash should be delivered up to the consul or other agent of Great Britain, who shall appear to receive him."

Whether Robbins, or, as he is called in this letter, Nash, was or was not a native citizen, will probably never be known with certainty. After he was hung in chains, a strong disposition was discovered to try his case, and great pains were taken to prove that he was not a native of the town in which he said he was born. Probably he was not a native of this country; I hope to Heaven he was not.

But, if it had been otherwise; if it had turned out upon this posthumous trial, that his story was true, it would have been a source of lasting regret to Mr. Adams; and, had he known precisely how the case stood before Judge Bee, sure I am he would not have interfered in the manner he did. He was governed, no doubt, by a rigid sense of justice, and a regard for the conditions of our treaty with Great Britain. But I have ever thought, and still think, the act was precipitate, and peculiarly unfortunate. Mr. Cooper, without doubt, thought this interference was without precedent, because no such case had happened before. He thought it against law, because the facts alleged by Robbins, as to his birth and impressment, should have been ascertained with certainty before he was delivered up. He thought it against mercy, because the man was delivered up to certain death. Such were the opinions of Mr. Cooper; opinions which, under our free system of Government, he ought to have been allowed to express and publish, without being dragged before a criminal court, or sentenced to a loathsome prison. Yet for this he was sentenced to pay a fine of four hundred dollars, to be imprisoned for the term of six months, and to enter into recognizance for his good behavior after that period, himself in one thousand dollars, with two sureties in five hundred dollars each. And was this no abridgment of the liberty of the press? The press is more free under the monarchy of Great Britain.

A further examination of this trial will show that the difficulty of proving facts and opinions of common notoriety, under this law, was such as to leave no chance of escape to any one indicted under it; and, accordingly, I believe none did escape. Judge Chase, in his charge to the jury, observed, that:

"The traverser, in his defence, must prove every charge he has made to be true. He must prove it to the marrow. If he asserts three things, and proves but one, he fails; if he proves two, he fails in his defence, for he must prove the whole of his assertions to be true. If he were to prove that the President had done every thing charged against him in the first paragraph of the publication; though he should prove to your satisfaction, that the President had interfered to influence the decisions of a court of justice; that he had delivered up Jonathan Robbins without precedent, against law and against mercy, this would not be sufficient unless he proved, at the same time, that Jonathan Robbins was a native American, and had been forcibly impressed and compelled to serve on board a British ship of war."

According to this, the most trivial mistake in point of fact or opinion would deprive the party indicted of all the advantages of that part of the law which allows the truth to be given in evidence. Indeed, that part of the act appears a mere mockery, when we read this trial, and see the difficulty of proving facts and opinions of common notoriety, by the technical nicety of the common law.

If the Government in 1798 had been sufficiently strong, as, thank Heaven! they were not, to give permanency to such a law, and such an administration of the law, there would have been an end to our boasted liberty of the press. The silence of despotism would have pervaded the Union, communicating a palsy to every part of our Constitution, which was intended to retard the march of aristocracy, or to defend the just rights of the great body of the people.

The friends of the sedition act say that Congress were authorized to pass it, as a law necessary and proper for carrying into effect the powers vested by the Constitution in the Government, under the 8th section of the 1st article of the Constitution.

This part of the Constitution is very elastic, and some gentleman discovered that under it Congress may do what they please, by simply making the word necessary mean convenient. But I cannot imagine what power vested by the Constitution in the Government it was necessary to carry into effect by the sedition act. That no such necessity as is alleged did exist is evident from this circumstance, that the Government went on very well before that act passed, and quite as well since it has expired. However convenient, therefore, the law might have been, it certainly was not necessary. If it was necessary in the meaning of the Constitution, it was indispensably necessary—not partly necessary. If necessary then, it must be necessary now, and Congress must of course be neglecting their duty in not reviving that law.

But the most extraordinary reason offered for passing that law is, that it was part of a system of national defence. If so, it must be required by that part of our Constitution which imposes it as a duty upon Congress to provide for the common defence. Whether this bill was recommended by the Secretary of War, or reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, I have not inquired; but, if it was intended as a part of our system of national defence, it should have been incorporated into the bill for establishing a navy, or for raising a standing army, or for arming the whole body of the militia of the United States. If national defence was the object of the bill, it should have appeared in some of its sections, or in its preamble, or in its title; its duration should have been limited to the period of the just and necessary war which it was then intended if possible to get up against France; instead of which it was limited, with an aspect somewhat ominous, to the third of March, 1801—the very day on which the Administration which it was meant to support ceased to exist. From all which it has been suspected that this act was no part of a system of defence for the nation, but for a party—a defence of the ins against the outs—a defence of a falling administration against the people who had determined to change their public servants.

We are now in effect to declare this act to have been Constitutional or unconstitutional. If we do the latter, we correct not the errors of the court, but of Congress. If the law was not Constitutional when passed, the decisions of the court could not make it so. Probably the court did not think that a question for them to decide. The act was a legislative construction of the Constitution expressly.

It was opposed and supported on Constitutional grounds, and is a declaration of the three branches of the Legislature of the meaning of the Constitution in this particular. And it is not yet ascertained that, in construing the Constitution, Congress is subordinate to the Judiciary. Probably the first decisive experiment upon this subject will prove the contrary.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia (Mr. WALKER) informed us that, as long as the act was in force, Constitutional or unconstitutional, it was the law of the land, and we were bound to obey its dictates. If it was the law of the land, it was the duty of the judges to see it enforced. The act, though not declaratory of the common law, was declaratory of the Constitution, or meant to be so. And the Judiciary considered that they were bound to carry it into effect, leaving those by which it was enacted to be responsible for its consequences.

If Congress infringe the Constitution, can they not heal the breach? If not, this is the most unfortunate instrument ever devised by man as a system of Government—subject indeed to the laws of decay and dissolution, without the possibility of redemption. If such be the case, our delightful anticipations of transmitting this instrument unimpaired to the latest posterity are idle dreams—the baseless fabric of a vision. But I trust, sir, there is a redeeming spirit, by which this sacred charter of our liberties, when violently and insidiously invaded, may be restored to its pristine purity.

If the last Congress had passed an act limited to the duration of the Congress, levying a duty on articles exported from the United States, with proper and penal clauses to enforce obedience; and if some individual with the spirit of Hampden had refused obedience to the law, and had been fined by the court for such disobedience one thousand dollars, and that fine had gone into our Treasury; can any one doubt that the present Congress would restore the money, and by that act virtually declare the former to have been unconstitutional?

We do not assume an appellate jurisdiction over the courts, but declare the law under which they acted null and void—the proceedings under it to have been coram non jure—the fines to have been levied in direct violation of our Constitution, and consequently no part of the lawful revenue of the country. We restore the money to those from whom it was extorted, agreeably to the dictates of common honesty.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia wishes to know in what part of the Constitution we are authorized to make donations. I leave that to be discovered by those who so frequently vote for donations. At present, no donation is contemplated. If we restore the money to Matthew Lyon, it will be an act of justice, not of favor.

But, the honorable gentleman makes himself somewhat merry with what he calls the modesty of Matthew Lyon. This petitioner, he says, very modestly asks, not only for the thousand dollars, but for interest, costs, and damages, and his pay as a member of Congress; and he apprehends the petitioner has a design to drain our Treasury. Most of those, sir, who make applications to Congress, take especial care never to lose any thing by not asking for enough. But I can see nothing so unreasonable in the petition of Matthew Lyon; for, if we should grant all he asks, it would fall far short of an indemnity for all his losses. But we are bound to restore what we have taken from him, with interest. Perhaps he will consider the eulogiums he has received as a sort of set-off against the residue of his claim; if not, he seems to be without remedy.

If Congress had repealed the law as unconstitutional, would they not have restored the money levied under it? Those who consider that the act should never have passed, as being unconstitutional, must be of opinion that our Treasury should not be replenished by such means; and, if so, can we conscientiously consider the money thus acquired as ours, unless indeed long possession has made it so, and we are to profit by our own neglect to do justice?

I do not think it necessary to search for precedents to justify us in the measure now proposed. If we have no precedent let us make one that may be a memento to dominant parties not to abuse their power. But if precedents were necessary, we may find enough in the history of England, not in that of our own country; for, fortunately for us, our history affords but a few instances of the abuse of power. For such precedents we need not go back to the heavy time of York and Lancaster, when the triumphant party constantly reversed all that had been done by the party subdued. We may look into a later period, when the Stuarts and their immediate successors were upon the throne, when the principles of liberty were much better understood than practised.

The attainder of the Earl of Strafford, who had been treacherously given up by a cowardly King to the indignation of Parliament, was reversed.

The attainders against Algernon Sidney and against Lord Russell were reversed.

The attainder against Alderman Cornish was reversed, as also that against Lady Lisle, and many others. In these cases, it is true, the Parliament only reversed their own proceedings. But they sometimes reversed the proceedings of other courts, as in the case of Bastwick, Burton, and Prynne, who were tried in the court of Star Chamber, for libels, and sentenced to lose their ears, to pay a fine of five thousand pounds each, and to be imprisoned for life. This is a very strong case, and in point; for the Parliament not only reversed the sentence, but remitted the fine, and ordered satisfaction for damages to the parties injured.

I must ask the indulgence of the Senate while I read a few passages from the proceedings in this extraordinary case. I shall read them for the edification of those who are, who have been, or who hereafter may be, in favor of a sedition act.

Dr. Bastwick, Mr. Burton, and Mr. Prynne, had written some religious books, in which were contained some reflections on the Bishops, which were deemed libellous. Mr. Prynne, three years before this time, had written a book in which he censured stage plays, music, and dancing, for which he was punished by the loss of his ears. "Between eight and nine o'clock in the morning, the fourteenth of June, [1637,] the Lords being set in their places, in the said court of Star Chamber, and casting their eyes at the prisoners, then at the bar, Sir John Finch, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, began to speak after this manner:*

"I had thought Mr. Prynne had no ears, but methinks he hath ears; which caused many of the Lords to take a stricter view of him; and, for their better satisfaction, the usher of the court was commanded to turn up his hair and show his ears; upon the sight whereof, the Lords were displeased that they had been formerly no more cut off, and cast out some disgraceful words of him.

"To which Mr. Prynne replied, My Lords, there is never a one of your honors but would be sorry to have your ears as mine are.

"The Lord Keeper replied again, In good faith, he is somewhat saucy.

"I hope, said Mr. Prynne, your honors will not be offended; I pray God to give you ears to hear.

"The business of the day, said the Lord Keeper, is to proceed on the prisoner at the bar.

"Mr. Prynne then humbly desired the court to give him leave to make a motion or two; which being granted, he moves:

"First, that their honors would be pleased to accept of a cross bill against the prelates, signed with their own hands, being that which stands with the justice of the court, which he humbly craved, and so tendered it.

"Lord Keeper. As for your cross bill, it is not the business of the day; hereafter, if the court should see just cause, and that it savors not of libelling, we may accept of it; for my part, I have not seen it, but have heard somewhat of it.

"Mr. Prynne. I hope your honors will not refuse it, being, as it is, on His Majesty's behalf. We are His Majesty's subjects, and therefore require the justice of the court.

"Lord Keeper. But this is not the business of the day.

"Mr. Prynne. Why then, my Lords, I have a second motion, which I humbly pray your honors to grant, which is, that your Lordships will please to dismiss the prelates, here now sitting, from having any voice in the censure of this cause, being generally known to be adversaries, as being no way agreeable with equity or reason, that they who are our adversaries should be our judges; therefore I humbly crave they may be expunged out of the court.

"Lord Keeper. In good faith it is a sweet motion; is it not? Herein you are become libellous; and if you should thus libel all the Lords and reverend judges as you do the reverend prelates, by this your plea, you would have none to pass sentence upon you for your libelling, because they are parties."

The whole trial is very interesting. I proceed to the sentence.

"Thus the prisoners, desiring to speak a little more for themselves, were commanded to silence. And so the Lords proceed to censure.

"The Lord Cettington's censure:—I condemn these three men to lose their ears, in the palace-yard at Westminster, to be fined five thousand pounds a man to His Majesty, and to perpetual imprisonment, in three remote places in the kingdom, namely, the castles of Caernarvon, Cornwall, and Lancaster.

"The Lord Finch addeth to this censure:

"Mr. Prynne to be stigmatized in the cheeks with two letters, S and L, for seditious libeller. To which all the Lords agreed."

I omit what is said of the punishment of Dr. Bastwick and Mr. Burton, which was inflicted with great cruelty, but that of Mr. Prynne deserves a particular notice:

"Now the executioner being come to sear him and cut off his ears, Mr. Prynne said these words to him: Come, friend, come burn me, cut me; I fear not; I have learned to fear the fire of hell, and not what man can do unto me. Come, sear me, sear me; I shall bear in my body the marks of the Lord Jesus; which the bloody executioner performed with extraordinary cruelty, heating his iron twice to burn one cheek, and cut one of his ears so close that he cut off a piece of his cheek. At which exquisite torture he never moved with his body, or as much as changed his countenance, but still looked up as well as he could towards Heaven, with a smiling countenance, even to the astonishment of all the beholders, and uttering, as soon as the executioner had done, this heavenly sentence: "The more I am beaten down, the more I am lift up."

What protection was afforded to these wretched men by the common law, the law in which they lived, and moved, and had their being?

The honorable gentleman from Georgia admonishes us not to destroy the independence of the judiciary, the bulwark of the liberties of the people. We shall not, in the measure now proposed, in the slightest degree, interfere with the independence of the judiciary. It must be a matter of indifference to them what we do with the sedition act; it cannot affect their emoluments. I have understood that the independency of the judiciary was regulated by the greater or less permanency in the tenure of their office, and the greater or less certainty in the payment of their fixed salaries.

But I must beg leave to differ from the honorable gentleman when he informs us that our independent judiciary is the bulwark of the liberties of the people. By which he must mean, defenders of the people against the oppressions of the Government. From what I witnessed in the years 1798, 1799, and 1800, I never shall, I never can, consider our judiciary as the bulwark of the liberties of the people. The people must look out for other bulwarks for their liberties. I have the most profound respect for the learning, talents, and integrity, of the honorable judges who fill our Federal bench. But, if those who carried into effect the sedition act are to be called the people's defenders, it must be for nearly the same reason that the Fates were called Parca—quia non parcabant. It would be a subject of curious investigation, how far the judiciary, from the earliest times to the present, have been the defenders of the people's liberties against the oppressions of Government; how much their zeal has been increased or diminished by the certainty or uncertainty in the tenure of office; how far by an increase or diminution of salary; how much it has been affected by a fear of loss of office or salary on one side, or the hope of further promotion or increase of salary on the other. But such speculations at present are unnecessary.

An observation or two more, and I will trespass no longer upon the patience of the Senate.

I hope the motion for indefinite postponement will not prevail. I hope that we shall pass the resolution; that we shall restore to Matthew Lyon the money that has been extorted from him; and, more especially, I hope we shall, as far as in us lies, repair the breach made in our Constitution by the sedition act. But the honorable gentleman from Georgia sees no such breach, but thinks we shall make one by adopting the present resolution; and he now implores us not to disturb this sacred instrument of our Union, which he considers as the sun of our political firmament. We gaze upon the meridian sun till we are dazzled with his splendors, and can see none of his imperfections. But, if we view him through a misty atmosphere, or, in imitation of children, through a smoked glass, we have a less splendid, but more distinct view of this luminary. We see the dark spots which deform his disk. So the honorable gentleman, taking a lofty view of the sun of our political firmament, through an attenuated atmosphere, is dazzled with its splendor—sees nothing but light and perfection. But, if he would condescend to view it through a more obscure and dense medium, he would see in this luminary certain dark spots, indicative of decay. He would perceive, sir, that its first amendment, once its most resplendent limb, is now obscured in dim eclipse, shorn of its beams, shedding around "disastrous twilight."

When Mr. D. had concluded—

Mr. MORRIL spoke at length against the resolutions.

Mr. ROBERTS spoke in favor of the resolutions.

Mr. DANA replied to Mr. R. and others; and the Senate adjourned.

SATURDAY, January 20.

THE PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, for the use of the members of the Senate, sixty copies of the Naval Register for the year 1821; and the letter was read.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, "requesting the President of the United States to communicate to the Senate any information he may have, as to the power or authority which belonged to Don John Bonaventure Morales and to the Baron Carondelet, to grant and dispose of the lands of Spain in Louisiana, previously to the year 1803"—I transmit a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a letter of the Commissioner of

JAMES MONROE.

JANUARY 18, 1821.

The Message and accompanying documents were read.

NEHEMIAH R. KNIGHT, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the death of James Burrill, jr., produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

The credentials of JAMES NOBLE, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Indiana, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next, were read, and laid on file.

Mr. KING, of New York, presented the memorial of Archibald Gracie, and sons, and others, shipowners and merchants of the city of New York, praying an extension of the time allowed by law for unloading ships and vessels arriving in the ports of the United States; and the memorial was read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill, reported yesterday by Mr. HORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, authorizing the sale of certain lots on the public reservation numbered 10, in the city of Washington, (the lots on C and on 4½ streets,) was read a second time.

SEDITION LAW—MATTHEW LYON.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the resolutions declaring the late sedition law unconstitutional, and to indemnify those who suffered damages under it—the motion of Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, made some days ago, to postpone the resolutions indefinitely, being still under consideration.

Mr. BARBOUR again addressed the Senate in support of the resolutions, and in reply to their opponents.

Mr. SMITH also again spoke in reply to Mr. BARBOUR and others who advocated the resolutions.

Mr. MACON likewise spoke again in support of the resolutions, and in defence of the opinions he had previously advanced.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, spoke at length against postponing the resolutions, though he preferred legislating for the particular case of Matthew Lyon.

Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, spoke again to vindicate his opposition to these resolutions.

The question was then taken on the indefinite postponement of the resolutions, and was decided in the affirmative, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Dana, Eaton, Elliott, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, King of New York, Lanman, Lloyd, Mills, Morrill, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Pinkney, Smith, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Dickerson, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, King of Alabama, Lowrie, Macon, Pleasants, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Talbot, Thomas, Trimble, Walker of Alabama, and Williams of Mississippi—19.

So the report and resolutions were rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR then gave notice that he should on Monday ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Matthew Lyon.

PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. TALBOT communicated the following preamble and resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, which were read:

"Whereas many of the citizens of this Commonwealth, allured by the prospect of increasing their wealth, or procuring a more desirable home for themselves or their posterity, which the uninterrupted growth of the Western country presented to activity and enterprise, became purchasers of the public lands of the United States, under a well-founded confidence that the earnings of honest labor, the profits of fair trade, or the sale of their other property, would speedily enable them to fulfil their engagements to the public: Whereas the unexpected depression in the price of labor and of property, the stagnation of trade, and the derangement of the local currency in the Western States, rendering it unfit for the payment of dues at the several land offices, have darkened the fairest prospects, deprived the public debtors of their power to fulfil engagements made in good faith, and thrown upon them and their country an accumulated load of debt and distress, which no foresight could avert and no exertion can remove: Whereas, in addition to all these events, the Congress of the United States have, by the act of April, 1820, reducing the price of public lands, deprived the debtors of their last resource, and rendered them unable to sell any part of their purchases, and thereby raise the means to fulfil their engagements; by which events and act the said purchasers are in danger not only of forfeiting their whole purchases, but of losing the money already paid, and are reduced to the humble necessity of resigning themselves to their fate, or soliciting indulgence for an indefinite period at the hand of their Government, with expense to themselves and injury to their country: And whereas it is not the interest or policy of a free Government to push the citizen beyond his ability, nor rigidly exact a forfeiture of his property when such penalty is neither merited by any wilful delinquency, nor useful in affording a salutary public example, it is, in the opinion of this General Assembly, the duty of the Congress of the United States, as it is within their power, to relieve the purchasers of public lands from this oppressive debt, on terms equitable to them and just to the Government: Wherefore,

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law permitting the purchasers of public lands at private sale to apply the instalments already paid to the payment in full for such portion of their purchases as such instalments may be adequate to pay for, at the price of two dollars per acre, and to relinquish the balance of their purchases to the United States.

"Resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be, and they are hereby, requested to present the foregoing preamble and resolution to the "Secretary."

MONDAY, January 22.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of John Bioren, of Philadelphia, and Fielding Lucas, jr., of Baltimore, booksellers, proposing to sell to Government a certain number of copies of the edition of the laws of the United States, published by said Bioren and others, and to print a sixth volume, to contain all subsequent laws to the close of the present session of Congress, under the authority and patronage of Congress; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of Ann Hodge, relict of George Hodge, deceased, late a boatswain in the Navy of the United States, praying to be remunerated for the loss of household furniture, occasioned by the burning of the navy yard at Washington, in the year 1814; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LOWRIE presented the petition of Thomas Dobson and son, booksellers of Philadelphia, praying that an act may be passed authorizing the purchase from them of six hundred copies of "Seybert's Statistical Annals of the United States," for the use of Government; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Shields, made a report, accompanied by a bill concerning Thomas Shields and others; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, gave notice that, tomorrow, he should ask leave to bring in a bill to establish a port of entry at Blakeley, in the State of Alabama.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of the 18th instant, instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of amending the act for the relief of the inhabitants of the late county of New Madrid, in the Missouri Territory, who suffered by earthquakes; and agreed thereto.

RELIEF TO LAND PURCHASERS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to extend relief to the purchasers of the public lands prior to the 1st of July, 1820.

When the bill was last under consideration, Mr. EATON moved to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands, with instructions to—

1st. Make the provisions of the bill applicable to those purchasers of public lands only who have purchased at public sale since the 30th day of December, 1816.

2d. And with instructions to extend the contemplated relief to none but those who, on or before the 30th day of October last, had made a settlement on the lands by them so purchased, defining and considering the settlement of any quarter section, a settlement of all contiguous and adjoining land, not exceeding two entire sections.

3d. And with instructions to extend the contemplated relief to no section on which any town may have been laid off, and the lots sold by any individual or company of individuals.

Mr. EATON spoke at some length in support of his motion, and to show that the bill, unamended in the mode he proposed, would be defective.

Mr. THOMAS briefly opposed the recommitment, because it would produce delay.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, opposed the motion to recommit, and advocated the bill at considerable length. Mr. J. spoke as follows:

The system of relief, said Mr. JOHNSON, which the bill provides, is embraced in two propositions: First, the power to relinquish that portion of the land which is entered, but not paid for, and to obtain a patent for what is paid for; secondly, indulgence for eight or ten years, by annual instalments, without interest, to those who prefer retaining the whole amount purchased. In the former case, it is so constructed as not to derange the surveys, or to produce any loss or inconvenience by interfering with the system upon which sales are now made. Under the present laws, our public lands are surveyed in ranges of six miles wide, and, by transverselines, at the same distances, divided into townships, as they are technically called, of six miles square, numbered from a line of latitude taken for the basis, and a meridian of longitude. These townships are each subdivided into thirty-six sections, of a mile square, or six hundred and forty acres, and these sections again subdivided into oblong rectangles of one-eighth of a section, or eighty acres each, and all divided by lines running with the four cardinal points. When the sales are made for which moneys are now due, the smallest sub-division was one hundred and sixty acres, the fourth part of a section; and, if a purchaser is now indebted for the smallest purchase which he could then make, he may now relinquish one-half of that purchase, without derangement to the present system. The provision made in the bill which is now proposed, carefully guards this point. If the purchaser shall choose to avail himself of the provision, he can relinquish only such aliquot part of a section as shall form the proper division, agreeably to the present system. The purchases made, which this bill will embrace, are either a section, six hundred and forty acres; three-fourths of a section, four hundred and eighty acres; a half section, three hundred and twenty acres; or a quarter section, one hundred and sixty acres. In every case, at least one-fourth part of the purchase money was paid within forty days of the time of application; another fourth part was required to be paid in two years; another in three years; the remainder in four years: and, in case any part shall be delayed till the expiration of five years from the day of application, the land is re-sold; and, unless some person shall advance cash in hand for what is due, the land reverts to the United States, and the whole of the money paid upon it, improvements and all, are forfeited, and the industrious, frugal, but more unfortunate husbandman, sent adrift with his family, and deprived of all the fruits of his honest labors. Now, sir, the bill before you proposes, that, in such cases, the purchaser may still be rescued from the grasp of penury and famine, in a land of plenty, by permitting him to retain so much of the land as the moneys paid by him will actually purchase, at the price of the original entry, not varying in quantity or form from the present legal sub-division, and to relinquish the remainder—a proposition that every honorable member of this House would accede to, under similar circumstances, in his own individual transactions with a poor and unfortunate debtor.

The second proposition is equally necessary to secure the purchaser from loss, and will equally secure the Government against any sacrifice. If a purchaser shall have entered a quarter section, (one hundred and sixty acres,) and shall have paid thereon only eighty dollars, the first instalment, it will not entitle him to a patent for any part of his purchase, as it will not have paid for eighty acres; or, if he shall have entered three-quarter sections, (four hundred and eighty acres,) and paid thereon only one instalment, two hundred and forty dollars, he will be entitled to a patent for eighty acres, amounting to one hundred and sixty dollars; but the remaining eighty dollars must be lost to him, unless relief be extended, by granting him time to complete his payment for an additional quantity of land. But most of these purchasers have paid more than the first instalment. They are generally an industrious, economical class of citizens, who, when they have been fortunate enough to collect small sums in return for their labor, pay them over to the land offices, as partial liquidations of the instalments due, or becoming due, for their lands, cheered by the animating prospect of being able one day to call that little portion of the wilderness on which their industry is creating perpetual smiles, their own. But all payments which either exceed or fall short of equal sums of one hundred and eighty dollars, the amount of purchase money for the smallest legal division of public land, must be forever lost to them and their families, unless the time shall also be extended, by which they may complete their payment for these aliquot parts of a section. One other course, it is true, might secure these over payments, which would be, to grant them certificates for such surpluses, receivable in payment for public lands; but no such provision is contained in the bill, and the relief proposed will be more for the interest of the Government, and quite as accommodating to the generality of those interested.

Let us have some regard to the character of those who need this relief. I mean the great body of this population, which must suffer without it. The question may seem to be local, from the particular interests which it involves; but no subject can, in reality, have a more extensive operation. It embraces the citizens of every section of every State in the Union; and the most useful and virtuous class of citizens, the honest, industrious farmers, by whose labors life and vigor are imparted to every other, and from whose persevering enterprise our country derives all its treasures. These citizens have left their homes, to subdue the wilderness, and make it subservient to the welfare of man, there to provide a home for themselves and their numerous offspring. With this class of citizens the security of our liberties, and the energies of the Government rest. To them we owe our national safety and prosperity. Virtue and independence, when exiled from every other class, find an asylum with them. They already form an impregnable barrier against territorial invasion; and it is a duty which the Government owes no less to itself than to them, to protect them from injustice, from injury, from ruin. Withhold the relief which their peculiar necessities now demand, and you give a deadly blow to the brightest hopes of the nation. It will be like refusing the kind offices of paternal care to a perishing child, who, if nourished, is destined to be your support and comfort in declining age.

There may be some exceptions to this description of character, but the proportion is very small; and a good man will not leave all his children to starve, lest the sons of strangers eat their crumbs. All have paid their money, all are citizens, and we can make no discrimination. None will receive relief beyond what justice warrants; the Government will lose nothing by any, and the measure, even in relation to the least meritorious, is founded in reason and equity. If any difficulty shall seem to exist in correctly designating the part to be relinquished, it is easily surmounted by the proposition which I have the honor to make; that when actual settlements are made, the part retained shall include the improvements, or such part of them as shall be contained within a regular legal division of the section; and when no improvements are made the division to be decided by lot. This will remove every difficulty which might arise from submitting the decision to either of the parties.

Those citizens have a claim to the consideration of the Government founded in equity. The amount due to the Government for sales of public lands is something less than twenty-four millions of dollars. For lands on which that amount is due, there cannot have been paid less than eight millions of dollars—one-fourth part of the purchase-money. And if one-half has been paid, then the money actually received is equal to the whole amount due. It is most probable that at least twelve millions have been paid; and if the relief shall be denied, this amount—the fruit of honest industry, drawn from the most virtuous and useful class of the community, the laboring husbandmen, into the public Treasury—must be forfeited and lost forever. Now, sir, let me inquire who among us is so lost to justice—so hardened against the cries of suffering innocence—that he would give his voice thus to fill the cup of misery, by replenishing the national coffers with twelve millions of dollars from this meritorious class of citizens, and then deprive them of the very lands which were designed to be purchased by that money? Let us bring this to a case betwixt individuals. Suppose one man sells to another a tract of land for four thousand dollars, to be paid in four annual instalments. The purchaser pays the two first instalments, (two thousand dollars,) and is unable to pay the balance. In such a case, what would be the course of an honorable man—one who loved justice—who acted upon the golden rule, "Whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so unto them?" Would he deprive the honest laborer of the hard-earned money which he had paid him, and triumphing in the misfortune of his neighbor, drive him, with his helpless babes, a houseless, homeless vagrant, upon the charities of an unfriendly world? No, sir; he would first inquire whether the failure to pay the residue had operated so as to subject him to any considerable loss. He would next inquire whether the land could be divided, without injury, so as to convey to the purchaser the worth of the money he had actually paid. He would then investigate the cause of the failure—whether it had originated in a fraudulent design of the purchaser. Being satisfied on all these points, that no special injury had arisen to himself in consequence of the failure; that the premises might be divided without injury or inconvenience; that the purchaser had failed to complete the payment through pure misfortune,—he would, without a moment's hesitation, either return him the money or divide the land, and convey so much as the payment made would cover. Such, sir, is precisely the case before us. The purchasers of public lands do not solicit your charity. Donations are not called for. Abatement in the price of the land is not expected. But they implore what they have a moral right to demand—they implore your justice. Confirm them in the possession of what they have paid for, at the price stipulated in the purchase, and give them the privilege of relinquishing the remainder; and where their payments do not exactly cover the legal rectangle, for where they have extended improvements over the different parts of the purchase, that they may receive quid pro quo for their moneys, or, that they may enjoy the benefit of their improvements, extend the time for paying the balance. This is what justice warrants them to expect, and is only continuing the principle which the Government has acted upon in former cases.

When times were more propitious than at present, relief has been repeatedly extended to others. Purchasers of lands between the Miami rivers, to whom a right of preëmption was given in consideration of their contract with John Cleves Symmes, were at first required to pay the whole purchase-money in three annual instalments. The inability of many to comply, rendered it necessary to forfeit their claims, or extend the time. The liberal course was adopted; and, after several years had elapsed, and relief more than once had been granted them, a law was passed which permitted them to hold the lands and liquidate the balances by six annual instalments, without interest. On several occasions, relief has been granted to other purchasers, by extending the time of payment, when their claims to indulgence were far less than at present. But why should we withhold relief at this hour of unparalleled pressure and distress? On a more auspicious day, these citizens became purchasers of the public domain, when the prospect of a fair remuneration invited to industry. They cheerfully endured the toils and privations incident to their undertakings, in prospect of happier days. Returning to their shelter, from the labors of the day, gladness sparkled in their eyes, and the smile of hope beamed in their countenances, as their little ones hailed their approach, because fortune promised them a long and comfortable abode. Shall these smiles of innocence be followed with tears of anguish and disappointment? Shall the labor of the parent be forfeited and the hope of infancy be blasted forever, when we can, without detriment to the public interest, still fan the heavenly flame? The voice of justice, the voice of mercy, the voice of God, forbid it. The times are now changed. The products of their labor and their lands find no place in market, or will command no money, in comparison with what they once would do. It would be the height of injustice and oppression to seize upon this occasion to deprive them of their homes, and reduce them to all the horrors of wretchedness and despair. They can still live, and exhibit all the joys of contentment, if you will afford them this relief. If they cannot get money, they can furnish the comforts of life without it, and cheerfulness will still rest in their bosoms. They are now waiting in awful suspense the result of this proposition—in anxious solicitude, betwixt hope and despair, whether the arrival of the courier will sound the trump of their jubilee, or ring the knell of their departed happiness.

It is necessary for us to look into the reasons for fixing this penalty to the law under which these purchases were made. It originated in a policy to influence punctuality on the part of purchasers, and to prevent an accumulation of the debts due from individuals to the Government. That reason exists no longer. The old system of credit is abolished, and the debts, therefore, never can accumulate. In doing away this reason, you have also diminished the means of payment; by requiring prompt payment for all lands sold, which drains the money from those sections of the country, and by diminishing the price of lands in reducing the minimum from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre. Thus you have at once renewed the objections to relief, and by the same act increased the necessity of that relief.

When the purchases were made, there existed a stronger pretext for the enforcing of the penalty. The law provides, that when those lands shall be offered for sale, if they fetch more than the balance due the United States, including interest and costs, the surplus shall be repaid to the original purchaser; and when the circulating medium was great, and but few forfeitures were made, the lands might command a price which would partially remunerate him for his improvements; but now, when the circulating medium is almost entirely withdrawn, nearly all the lands must be forfeited, and there is not one-twentieth part of the money in ail the States and territories together, where these lands lie, necessary to pay the balances due upon them.

The Government is bound in justice to grant the relief; and these citizens have a moral right to demand it. It may be classed among the imperfect rights; imperfect, only because they have not the legal nor physical power to enforce the demand; but the right, in its binding efficacy upon the conscience, is perfect and complete; the same as a father's perfect right, in morality and religion, to demand honor and gratitude from his son; but the right is imperfect in law, because he cannot legally enforce it.

In the case of the purchaser of the public land, there is an equity of redemption in his favor. This word is technical in the language of the law, and is referred to a principle established between mortgagers and mortgagees. In the case of a mortgage between citizens, a court of equity will not consider the mortgaged premises vested in the mortgagee, though the party who has given the mortgage fails to pay the money on a day certain, fixed by express contract in writing. So uniform have been the decisions of courts of equity in these cases, that the principle is universally established, even beyond controversy, that whatever number of years may have elapsed, the party has a right to redeem his mortgaged premises, by paying the principal and interest of the sum for which the mortgage was given; and in no case, can the property mortgaged be sold, nor the fee simple vested in the mortgagee, but by a foreclosure of the mortgage, and a decree of the court of chancery. The cases may not be exactly similar; but the resemblance is sufficiently strong to show that the equity of redemption, if we may use the expression, is as great in favor of the purchasers of public lands, and against the right of the Government to deprive them of their domains.

According to the former system of our land laws, the purchaser had the right to purchase by prompt payment, or by instalments; but he could not purchase even the smallest subdivision by prompt payment, so as to procure a patent for his land, and thus secure it to himself and his heirs, for less than $264 40, exclusive of discount. The poor man, then, who could command but a little sum, was under the necessity of purchasing upon the terms of credit which the law provided. Now he can purchase the amount of a legal subdivision, 80 acres, so as to obtain his patent, for $100. Suppose, sir, the poor man, four years since, entered the smallest quantity which could then be purchased, 160 acres, and paid upon it 80 dollars at the time of entry, and two years thereafter he paid the second instalment, 80 dollars more, making together 160 dollars; there is no doubt that, could he have the right of bringing his case into a court of equity, as he might do against an individual, the court would establish this principle—that the failure, being without fraud, and the point being ceded, as in this case, that the division was neither injurious nor inconvenient to the seller, the unfortunate purchaser should be confirmed in his claim to 80 acres, the amount which he had actually paid for at the original price. The chancellor would say, "as no fraud has been committed by the purchaser; as the means of payment are cut off by the withdrawal of the circulating medium, producing great calamity and distress, beyond both the control and foresight of either party; and as the Government, by changing the system and reducing the price of lands, has contributed much more than the purchaser to his inability to pay, the loss to the purchaser is still sufficiently great; for, had he saved his money till this time, one hundred dollars would have purchased all that he now claims for the payment of 160 dollars; he shall therefore be confirmed in his claim."

The provision for extending the time of payment might be more doubtful in a court of equity, but not less necessary to secure to the honest laborer the reward of his industry, and measure out to him the full cup of justice. The Government will thereby receive a higher price for the lands thus obtained than to suffer them to revert, and at the same time promote the interests of the most deserving class of the community. In many cases injustice will be done to the purchasers, and ruin will fall upon their families without it. The benefit will be almost exclusively in favor of the poor, whom it is a public duty to protect. A person has purchased one hundred and sixty acres, and paid the first instalment, according to law, at the time of purchase. By the sweat of his brow he has since raised forty dollars, with which he has made a partial payment upon the second instalment. The price was two dollars per acre, and he has paid one hundred and twenty. The pressure of the times renders it impossible for him to procure money; and as the sum paid will not cover the purchase of eighty acres, he must lose all that he has paid, unless you extend the time. This, sir, is not an imaginary, but a real case: not a solitary case, for hundreds, and even thousands, of such cases do exist; and tens of thousands of our fellow citizens, of every age and sex, must inevitably be reduced to misery and ruin, if the provision shall be denied them.

If their own imprudence had brought these disasters upon them, they would have a slighter claim to consideration; but, unless we ascribe to them angelic foresight, or more sagacity than has ever yet fallen to the lot of man, we cannot justly charge them with imprudence. If no change had taken place in the circulating medium of the country; if our markets had remained the same at home and abroad; if the price of labor had not depreciated; if the same amount of exportation and importation had continued; their ability to meet the instalments would have continued, and the forfeitures would have been in as small a ratio to the purchasers as at any former period. The disorders in our currency, and the consequent depression of all our moneyed concerns, originated in the struggles of the late war—events which no human sagacity could foresee. Before that event, no general pecuniary embarrassments threatened us, and we could anticipate no extraordinary fluctuations. The banks had the confidence of the people; and in all their operations they maintained the specie standard. Contracts were sacredly executed, or the remedy was within our own control; and confidence between citizens was unimpaired. But war was proclaimed, and our national expenditures were necessarily increased to an amount beyond the power of taxation to meet. Loans were resorted to, which were confined principally to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, the greater part of which was drawn from banks disposed to aid the Government in its efforts to sustain the independence and glory of the nation. An excessive issue of notes was the consequence; and as confidence began to be shaken on account of the internal divisions which existed, the circulation of those notes became local, and caused them to return upon the banks. At this moment, as by a kind of inspiration, to sustain their own credit and their country's cause, the banks simultaneously suspended the payment of specie; and the causes which produced this suspension were so identified with the honor, the rights, and the independence of the country, that there was a general and almost universal acquiescence in the measure.

When peace returned, the whole country became impatient for the resumption of specie payments; and, to satisfy the general call which was unfortunately pressed upon the banks, specie payments were resumed at least five years too soon for the general good, unless it had been very gradually introduced, so as to give time for loans to have been collected more leisurely and as the people could meet the calls. At the same moment Europe was laboring to effect the same object. France and the United States were the only specie countries in all our commercial relations. The general peace of Europe had produced a total revolution in the labor and commercial intercourse of the civilized world. Russia was making bonfires of her paper. England was making every exertion to substitute a specie currency for her paper, and inundating this country with her merchandise to supply her coffers with bullion; and the nation was almost drained of specie to supply other countries with which we had intercourse. Such was the state of affairs when the vaults of our banks were opened to sustain their solvency. The thirteen millions of surplus money in the Treasury was soon exhausted in payment of the floating debt. Paper flowed like torrents into the banks, by which the circulating medium was almost entirely withdrawn; and, to meet the demand, the banks called upon their debtors, who were by that very circumstance deprived of the means of payment. Property was sacrificed for want of purchasers, because the means of raising funds were at an end. The banks were crushed, individuals were ruined, and the community has sustained a loss of not less than fifty millions of dollars. In this state of things, there is an utter impossibility of the purchasers of public land meeting claims against them. Coercion will be fruitless; and by tearing from them their lands you will only fill up to them the cup of misery without relieving others.

As their claim is founded in justice; as they are among the most valuable of our citizens; as the relief will not injure the Government, while it will impart happiness to thousands and contribute to increase the wealth and resources of the nation, it is devoutly hoped that the unanimous voice of the Senate will sanction the measure.

Mr. NOBLE followed in a short speech on the same side of the question, and of the same purport.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, also opposed the recommitment, at some length, and incidentally defended the object and general provisions of the bill.

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: I can see no sufficient reason for recommitting this bill, especially at this stage of the discussion. If the Senate concur in opinion with the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, all his objects may be obtained in the usual mode, and in the shape of amendments. At any rate, a recommitment should not take place until some general principles are fixed, until we have agreed on the leading features of that system of relief which we may deem it expedient to grant. That some relief is necessary, seems to be universally conceded; we differ only as to the mode and the degree.

Let us notice the objects for which a recommitment is asked. The first is, to limit the relief proposed by the bill to those purchasers of the public land who have bought since the 30th December, 1816, leaving those who bought lands before that day to abide as they may the terms of their contracts, and the tender mercies of the law of forfeiture. In support of this proposition it is said, that they have had sufficient indulgence already; that they have repeatedly had the advantages of relief; that their years of grace have been many, and that they have no reasonable claim to more. Let us inquire a little into this matter. Why have you given time heretofore? Because these persons were unable to comply with their engagements, and because you did not deem it politic to drive them from the lands which they had improved, and for which they had made partial payment; because, in short, you would not involve them in distress and ruin. But this indulgence was merely an extension of time, and these purchasers paid the price of it. You exacted interest still, and a portion of the principal annually. Those who could not pay this price, reaped not the benefit of your indulgence. On this unfortunate class the law of forfeiture took its course, and was consummated; and those who had the means made final payment, for the purpose of freeing themselves from the increasing load of interest. It would seem then that the purchasers anterior to the year 1817, are not so clearly beyond the pale of an equitable clemency, as the gentleman supposes. They have paid the price of the indulgence which they have received; and it should be shown that they are in a condition now to do what they were confessedly unable to do heretofore. I say nothing of the situation of those who bought only a short time before this golden era of mercy—in the year 1816 for instance, and whose year of grace, even according to the contract, is not expired. It is evident that they have received no indulgence, and can receive none, if this proposition should succeed. Would this be fair? would it be equal? would it be just? I think not. Their condition would be worse than that of those going before or coming after them. It would be an odious anomaly, marring the harmony and beauty of your system.

The gentleman from Tennessee contends that the late purchasers, particularly those in Alabama, are better entitled to relief than others, because they have purchased at enormous prices. This is very true, and I concur entirely in his opinion. Sir, the situation of Alabama is peculiar, is critical, is deplorable. Relief that will be efficient and adequate for the other new States, would be much less so for her. Time alone would do nothing for her, except in the cases of the fortunate few who made their purchases at reasonable rates. For others we must resort to very different provisions, which I shall take the liberty to suggest in the further progress of this bill.

But, Mr. President, this is a great national question, which, however deeply and pre-eminently it may concern Alabama, does not concern Alabama alone; it embraces the Union. When we act on it, we must look at the paramount interests of the entire Confederacy. We must frame a system which shall be general, which shall take in the whole, and particular hardships are incident to all such general measures. They may be deplored, but they must be submitted to. But I shall have more to say on this point in its proper place. Meantime, I content myself with repeating that this object of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee may be obtained directly by an amendment, more conveniently than by the circuitous process of recommitment.

The second object of a recommitment is to confine the relief proposed by the bill to actual settlers only—to those who had made an actual settlement before the 30th October, 1820. Those who have not made such settlement are denounced as speculators, and speculators are entitled to no redress. Speculation ought to be repressed and discountenanced, and subjected to the ban of penalty and forfeiture. I know this Senate too well; I have too high a respect for its intelligence and liberality to suppose, for a moment, that it is in danger of being misled by a name. I can see nothing in the nature and reason of the thing which calls upon Congress, acting for the United States at large, to make the discrimination proposed. It is in the nature of a premium on actual settlement, a bounty for removing from the old States to the new. It supposes that there is something of positive merit in such removal, which is entitled to reward. If this be so, why not proclaim the fact? Why not embody it in your system? Why not make the advantage known before the sale? Why not draw your line of distinction prospectively, and not retrospectively? Why hold out the same terms to all, if you do not intend to mete out to all the same equal measure of justice? Sir, it seems to me that you are foreclosed, in all equity and good conscience, from making this distinction. It is not "in the bond." Your faith is pledged, and you are bound, in all fair construction of the contract, to make no such distinction. I speak now of the Union. With regard to the new States, the question assumes a totally different aspect and character. Population is their strength. They desire, for the most obvious and cogent reasons, to increase it. Every immigrant not only adds to their numerical force, but he brings from abroad an accession to their wealth. He improves the soil; he supports the local government; he imparts new vigor to the body politic; he gives new value to every thing around him. Well may the new States, therefore, be ready to welcome him. They, indeed, might very naturally be willing to make distinctions in his behalf. But can they do so? Have you left them at liberty to pursue a course so obviously advantageous to them? You have done no such thing. As if foreseeing this very result, you have taken the precaution, as far as in you lay, to tie up their hands. You have looked at the interest of the whole, and not of a part. You have regarded the public lands as the domain of the nation. Your object has been to sell them for the highest price. You invite all the world to the auction. The only condition of the sale is, that the highest bidder shall be the purchaser. You do not inquire whether he live in Maine, or on the lakes, or the Gulf of Mexico, or at the foot of the Stony mountains. He may reside in terra incognita, or the moon. You ask not, you cannot. All you ask is his money. You want a chapman, who will give the highest price for your commodity. You do not limit the quantity which an individual may buy. His purse and his judgment are left to fix the limit. You do not require him to erect a cabin, or girdle a tree. The property is his, and he is allowed "to manage his own concern in his own way." But do you stop here? Do you content yourselves with this negative legislation? You do not, sir. You go still further, and, lest the new States, in their sovereign capacities, and for their local interests, should make discriminations in the burdens which they may see proper to impose on the soil, you cautiously restrain them, and you declare "that the lands of non-residents shall never be taxed higher than the lands of residents." This article enters into every act by which any of your Territories has been authorized to become a State. It is part of the consideration of admission into the federal family. It is of permanent obligation, and cannot be rescinded without your consent. Thus careful have you been to protect the rights of purchasers, let them live where they may; and this policy increased the number of bidders, and enhanced the value of your lands. But when have you required actual settlement as a condition of the purchase? When have you made distinctions in favor of actual settlers? How often have you refused any particular advantages to squatters? And will you make a difference after the sale which you did not make before? And will you tie the hands of the new States, lest they should follow their particular interests, to your prejudice, while you yourselves commit a gratuitous injustice—an injustice the more cruel, from the very pains which you have taken to mask it? But, whatever may be the decision of the Senate on this point, it should not be forgotten that a recommitment is not necessary to attain it.

The third object of a recommitment is, to exclude town sites from the operation and benefits of the bill. These, again, have been matter of speculation and profit, and ought to be beyond the pale of relief; and the gentleman tells us that the town companies and other companies of speculators, bid up the lands to enormous prices, and excessively enhanced their value in the market. And he quotes a case, in Alabama, where a town company gave upwards of eighty thousand dollars for less than three thousand acres. Here, then, the speculators gave more than twenty-four dollars the acre; and must have paid for the first instalment only, upwards of twenty thousand dollars—when the fee-simple, at the minimum price, would have been less than six thousand. And who was the receiver of this enormous sum? Your Treasury, sir. It has already in its vaults more than the entire value of the land. Yes, sir, the Government is, in reality, the great land speculator. Your system is built upon speculation. You have encouraged and fostered it; you have lent it aid and inducement; you have shared in its gains; your cryers have set forth your commodity with all the art and cloquence of auctioneers. All the blandishments of description have been lavished; the eager excitement of public competition has been employed; and now you stigmatize your dupes and repel them from your clemency. But, if it shall be the good pleasure of the Senate to exclude town sites from the benefits of the bill, I shall acquiesce. I do not object. But let this be done by a direct amendment; and do not send back the bill to a committee for such a purpose. This is, in fact, but a trifling matter—a mere affair of detail; and I am ashamed to have occupied your attention on it so long. I will pass to considerations of higher import.

Let us look, then, Mr. President, at the bill itself; let us examine, a little more nearly, the system of relief which it proposes; let us inquire into its inducements and its objects, and estimate the force of the motives by which it appeals to our support. This is the more necessary at this time, since to recommit with specific instructions is to pass on its merit or demerit; is to fix principles; is, in short, to decide the fate of the bill. I consider the whole question as now fairly and fully before us; and I am encouraged to go on by the wish of certain gentlemen near me, to whom the subject of the public lands, in its multifarious character and interest, is not very familiar.

The national domain is of immense extent, and stretches over regions of every variety of soil. I shall not enter into the history of its acquisition. It is with your mode of disposing of it, that we have to do. This was, for a considerable period, variant and irregular. But in 1802 you adopted a regular, well-defined, and comprehensive system, which continued to be in operation until the 1st of July, 1820. By this system, the lands were laid off in townships of six miles square, each containing thirty-six sections; which, again, were subdivided into quarters, of one hundred and sixty acres each. This was the smallest subdivision known to your law until 1817, when six sections in each township were made divisible, at the option of the purchaser, into tracts of eighty acres, or half-quarter sections. So much for the mode of survey, and the size of the tracts: and so far your system was beautiful and excellent. It still remains without alteration, except that every section is now divisible into half quarters: an alteration which, while it did not impair the beauty and harmony of the system, was of the highest political importance, as tending directly to increase the number of freeholders—the strength and glory of a nation.

The land, so divided, was sold at public auction to the highest bidder. One fourth of the purchase money was paid in hand, and the residue was payable in three instalments, of two, three, and four years, bearing interest from the date of the purchase, if not punctually paid; and, if any portion of the purchase money remained unpaid at the expiration of five years from the date of the purchase, the land became forfeited to the United States, and was re-sold for their benefit. It could not be sold for less than the whole sum remaining unpaid, including interest: but if sold for more than that sum, the excess was paid to the former purchaser. I forbear to mention other particulars of detail, as unnecessary to my present purpose.

What was the practical result of this system? An enormous debt, sir, continually accumulating, growing with the growth of the new States, until, on the 30th of September, 1819, it had amounted up to the frightful sum of upwards of twenty-two millions of dollars! Half of which had been added during the last two years immediately preceding that date. This was the radical defect of the system. The debt was always growing, with an accelerating ratio, at an average of more than a million a year, until it hung like an ugly excrescence over half the Republic. You began to regard it with an eye of apprehension. You saw in the relation of debtor and creditor something unbefitting the relation of the citizen towards the Government. Too much might be expected on the one hand, and too much or too little refused or granted on the other. The very magnitude of the debt was alarming, especially when considered in connexion with its inherent vice of continual increase. Its locality, too, was not without interest. It was not diffused in equal ratio over all parts of the Union. It was confined to the new States. These, standing in the same situation, must be supposed to have a common feeling, as well as a common interest, on this subject. Their number was increasing, their population augmenting with unparalleled rapidity. Their representation in the councils of the Union were increasing, pari passu, with their population. Already it was nearly one-third of this body. What might not be feared from this debt when it should have reached a hundred millions, when the debtors should constitute half your numerical force, and occupy the largest and fairest portion of your empire? The apprehension of evil seemed natural and reasonable; and rational patriots, loving the Union, and desiring to perpetuate it, could not but wish to arrest the march of a system carrying in its bosom so much of inquietude and danger for the future. This you have done. You have performed your duty. You have accomplished the first great object of your wishes. You abolished the system; and you have instituted a new one, which excludes credit altogether from all future purchasers of the public lands. Cash, and cash alone, is received in payment. The danger from the further increase of the debt no longer exists. The debt has reached its maximum. We must look at the debt, then, as it now exists, divested of its most odious features. It is a monster still; but it is no longer dangerous to you; it threatens, now, only those who are its subjects, on whom it presses with a mountainous weight, and whom it must crush as victims unless they shall be rescued from impending ruin by some timely act of clemency on your part.

What, then, is the measure now proposed by the Committee on the Public Lands? The bill allows to purchasers, 1st, a right to surrender any legal subdivision of their purchases, to transfer the money paid on the part surrendered, and apply it to the discharge of the sum due or unpaid on such legal subdivisions as they may choose to retain; 2d, a deduction for prompt payment; 3d, instalments for the sums due or unpaid; and, 4th, remission of interest to all who comply with the terms proposed. Its objects seem to be to hasten the extinction of the debt, to get money, and to grant adequate relief.

The privilege of transfer is of the first importance. It is an admirable expedient for lessening the debt, without sacrificing the interest of either party; and it will be worth more, especially to Alabama, than all the other provisions of the bill. It will afford great relief to thousands. It will enable them to save some portion of their lands; it will release them from debt, by abandoning what they cannot pay for; it will save their money from being swallowed up for nothing; it will prevent forfeiture, and the distress and odium attendant on forfeiture—distress to the citizen and odium to the Government; while it puts at once into the hands of the United States land which will bring its fair value in cash, and which may thus be resold without exciting public sympathy for the first purchaser, who would always profit by it in cases of involuntary forfeiture; and, above all, it will diminish the great land debt more than any other feature of the bill. This principle, I shall hope, then, will receive the unanimous sanction of the Senate.

But the privilege of transfer merely—of removing payments made on a tract surrendered, and applying them to the discharge of the debt on the tract retained—does not equalize conditions, and put purchasers under the old system on the footing of those who buy for cash, because each and every purchase was bottomed on the indefinite credit allowed for the three last instalments; and because the minimum price, and consequently the current value, was greater than it is now, in the proportion of eight to five. But transfer and deduction of three-eighths from the original price would do this in a great degree; and purchasers would only get the same quantity and the same tracts which they would have bought originally, had the sales been made for cash only. I shall therefore at a proper time move an amendment combining these principles.

The second section of the bill allows a deduction for prompt payment. It is to be observed that a very large portion of this enormous sum of twenty-five millions outstanding and unpaid is not yet due, especially in Alabama. The day of grace is still distant—in many cases several years. The object of this section is to hasten the extinction of these future debts, by holding out to your debtors inducements to make such a course desirable to them on the score of interest. They may "owe you a debt, but they would be loth to pay you before your day." If you wish to anticipate that day, you must appeal to their interest; you must offer some consideration—some motive—and this is presented in the shape of this allowance or discount. This is still in blank. It is obvious that the amount to be derived immediately from this section will depend very much upon the rate of discount. The more liberal the deduction, the greater the prompt payments. This is the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, who proposes the principles of this bill in aid of the finances. Of one thing I am convinced—that more money will be obtained by the bill than ever would be obtained without it. Five-eighths of the purchase-money is much more than Alabama lands could be sold for. The amount of the first payment—the first instalment, as it is popularly called—could not, in innumerable instances, be had for them. This is not an idle conjecture; it is a fact proved recently by actual sales. The lands in Colbert's reserve were sold at Huntsville last autumn under your new cash law; and, although their situation is superior to any in the Tennessee valley, they did not on the average bring so much as the first instalment of adjoining lands of equal quality sold two years before. In very many cases, indeed, I have no doubt that it would be more advantageous to purchasers to incur a forfeiture, and buy again, rather than seek relief under this bill. They would make money by it in the end. But this course would require patience and courage. It must encounter the vexation of delay and suspense—the most tormenting state of the mind. It would arrest improvement, and it would not be unmixed with apprehension. Great exertions, therefore, under the operation of proper inducements, would be made to prevent forfeiture. Men form attachments to the chosen spots—they are endeared by a thousand agreeable and powerful associations—and much would be sacrificed to preserve them from risk. Yes, sir, the settler has fixed his heart on the spot of his choice. It is his home. It is improved by his labor, embellished by his taste, in part paid for by his money. It contains the cabin which shelters his wife and children, and which may have been their tower of refuge from the tomahawk and scalping-knife.

SENATE.

The little orchard is of his own planting; the little garden smiles from the culture of his wife; his old friends, who have followed him to the wilderness, neighbor around him. These are items of that strong passionate predilection with which you have to deal; but this predilection has its limits. These ties are strong, but they may be broken.

Mr. President, Congress can fix the value of lands in the new States and Territories. You can raise and depress it at pleasure. The price between individuals must bear some relation to that of the Government. Mr. Crawford admits this frankly, and argues from it, with truth and force, proving that this immense domain of the Union must leave this power for a long time to come in your hands. Of that immense domain, what a small speck has been sold! How little, comparatively, has been even surveyed! Vast regions remain still covered by Indian title. Your official agents estimate the total number of acres to which the Indian title has been extinguished at 191,978,536! the number of acres surveyed at 72,805,092! and the number sold at 18,601,930! The difference in these aggregates is prodigious. You are still, and must long remain, a mighty monopolist. You can regulate the price of your commodity at will. You do so regulate it. The entire minimum now is less by one-sixth than three-fourths of the old minimum; and, where the lands are of equal value, must effectually disable the credit purchaser from entering the market as your competitor, unless at the absolute loss of three-eighths of his capital. Can individuals sell their land for two dollars, when your price is one dollar and a quarter? Their certificates, with the first payment made, would not be received as a present, under the condition of completing the purchase according to the terms of the original contract, as there would remain to be paid one dollar and a half, and the donee would be a clear loser by twenty-five cents the acre! The same relation of prices exists, whatever may be the cost of the land. The diminution of actual current value is real and absolute, and universal. And this diminished value proceeds from the act of the Government. Yes, sir, from your own act. Will you thus vitally affect the condition of your debtor, and afford him no redress? Will you suddenly lessen the value of the article, after the sale, and still exact the full price? Will you lessen his ability to pay, and yet require "the utmost mite?" Will you insist on "the pound of flesh," because it is so written "in the bond?" I think you will not: I am sure you ought not.

In this view, the remission of interest now proposed, cannot be more than equivalent to the diminished value effected by the change of system from credit to cash; and that, even on low priced lands; on others, it is nothing like an equivalent. Sir, the remission of interest is not a new principle. It is only an extension of the principle on which Congress has long acted. At first the interest accrued, by the term of the contract, on each instalment, from the date of the purchase, absolutely; afterwards this principle was relaxed, and interest accrued only on failure of punctual payment. Here was a great change, highly favorable to the purchaser, and certainly not demanded by such powerful motives as now cry aloud for a further change. The former was matter of mere grace: the latter grows out of a strong equity, fastening itself upon you in consequence of your own subsequent act, for your own advantage.

We come now, sir, to the credit. And what was the credit under the old system? We have seen that it was nominally for five years, in the first instance. Then three more were granted: then three more: then forfeitures were suspended from year to year: and there the matter rests at present. The credit was, in fact, indefinite. Congress never refused indulgence: and lands are still in part unpaid for, which were sold soon after the credit system was adopted.

In Alabama, for instance, eight years from the date of the purchase, had been already granted to debtors in Madison county, and on the Tombigbee; and at the unfortunate sales of 1817 and 1818 no man calculated on a shorter term. Congress was considered to be pledged, in good faith and equal dealing, to indulge them as much as it had indulged others. This cry was in everybody's mouth. This was regarded as a tacit condition of the contract; and it was a consideration which, whether true or false, operated powerfully and universally: I need not say how ruinously, if you now refuse what you never refused before. But this you will not do. You will not subject yourselves to the imputation of hard-heartedness and partiality. To refuse time now to those who have had no indulgence, would be unequal and unjust; and this is the case with nearly all Alabama, who needs relief the most, and has the strongest claims upon you for it.

The credit purchasers calculated on the indefinite continuance, if not the perpetuity, of the system. At any rate, they were innocent purchasers, for a fair consideration, and they have a fair equitable claim to be relieved and protected against an act of the other party to the contract, which lessens directly and necessarily, in their hands, the value of the property which they had purchased.

What sort of comparison, then, can there be between the motives to afford relief heretofore, and those which call for it now? Then, there was no chance of system, no reduction of price, no diminution of value; and the amount of the debt was annually increasing; yet you never refused relief. Now, the system is changed by your act; the price is reduced by your act; the value of the article sold is diminished in the hands of the purchaser, by your act; and the debt cannot be further increased; it has reached its maximum; and will you now, for the first time, refuse relief?

This, Mr. President, is a general view of the subject, and these arguments will reach and cover the case of the debtors in all the new States. But, I have said, that the situation of Alabama was peculiar. Sir, it is deeply distressing and deplorable. It stands out from the canvass in bold relief. Suffer me to call your attention to a few facts, by way of verification:

According to the returns, there has been actually paid in other States, per acre, not quite one dollar and twenty cents: and there remains due, per acre, in those States, not quite seventy-five cents.

There has been paid, per acre, in Alabama, not quite one dollar and twenty-five cents; and remains due there, per acre, not quite two dollars and seventy-five cents.

It appears, then, that 14,955,073 acres in other States, have been sold for - - $28,741,886

While only 3,646,857 acres in Alabama, have been sold for - - 15,312,565

Leaving a difference in amount of only - - - - $13,429,321

But, if lands in Alabama had been sold at the same average price per acre, as in other States, the amount of sales there would have been only about $6,650,000; nothing like half the actual amount; and making the enormous difference of eight millions and a half of dollars. For the debt of Alabama, according to the returns up to 30th September, 1819, is $10,834,270, being less than the debt of all the other States and Territories only by the trifling sum of $332,116. But, had only equal prices been given, the debt of Alabama would be only about $2,180,000, making a difference of debt in the two cases, as before, of eight millions and a half.

This, according to the returns up to September, 1819. But, it is proper to remark, that a portion of the lands sold at St. Stephens, lie in the State of Mississippi. The amount, however, due for them in that State is not very great, and the lands sold at that office are by far the lowest in Alabama. The price given there is, on the average, only about two dollars and thirty-eight cents the acre; while at Cahawba it is about three dollars and seventy cents; and, at Huntsville, about five dollars and ninety cents! A single township in the Tennessee valley was sold for half a million of dollars—upwards of twenty dollars the acre.—Many tracts, for actual settlement, were sold at thirty and forty dollars, and one as high as seventy-eight dollars; sites for towns, still higher.

Nine hundred and fifty-one thousand one hundred and thirty-one acres have been sold, at St. Stephens, for $2,266,076. Suppose that, of this sum, there is due, in Mississippi, $834,270; and this is perhaps near the truth, it certainly does not exceed it. This would reduce the debt of Alabama, in round numbers, to ten millions of dollars, and would reduce the number of acres sold in Alabama to three thousand two hundred and ninety-six thousand, six hundred and ninety-three; calculating all lands sold at St. Stephens at the same average price, while, in fact, the portion which lies in Mississippi was sold before the era of distraction, and at scarcely more than the old minimum price. Could we speak in exact terms, the number of acres sold lying in Cahawba would be still fewer, and the relative price greater; and the excess of price which has been given and promised there, over that for an equal number of acres elsewhere, would be still further increased. Say, however, that it is eight millions, and it cannot be made less, from the tables, by any practical calculation, and what shall be said of it? A debt of ten millions from a single State—of which eight millions is mere excess of price—a sum given, or rather promised, in Alabama, beyond the sum given or promised, anywhere else, for the same number of acres. Does it not make a strong claim upon your clemency? And will you refuse all manner of relief? You will not, you cannot. But this bill is general. It affords no special relief to Alabama.

I fear, sir, that I have already trespassed too long on the patience of the Senate, fatiguing others even more than I fatigue myself. But the deep interest of my constituents in the subject must plead my apology. Indulge me, therefore, a few moments longer, and let us see if we cannot unravel the mystery of these high prices in Alabama—the causes of this enormous debt. Sir, there is no mystery in it; the causes are obvious, and the finger of the Government is visible throughout the whole transaction.

Almost the whole of the debt of Alabama has been contracted since the war, and during the period of our highest apparent prosperity. The first sales took place in August, 1817, and in February and March, 1818. It was an era, not merely of plenty, but of superabundance; and it begat a thousand wild schemes of every sort and character. The spirit of speculation possessed almost the entire mass of society. You yourselves were infected with the contagion of extravagance. The national coffers were overflowing, and you busied yourselves in devising new modes of expending your excessive wealth. You gave the tone, the people caught and echoed it. Everywhere visions of magnificence occupied and heated the public mind. The circulating medium was everywhere unnaturally abundant, but nowhere so much so as in Alabama. About seventy banks were just instituted in the neighboring States of Tennessee and Kentucky. If they were without capital what did that signify? Their paper was receivable in your land offices where it was as good as gold or silver. They were anxious to lend. Everybody who could muster a couple of endorsers could borrow. Capital was not necessary either to the banks or their customers. Credit was all, and credit was universal. Everything was fictitious. No man was without money, or the representative of money. Cotton was selling at twenty-five cents the pound, and all other articles in proportion—that being there the common standard of appraisement, the measure of value. This state of things was naturally calculated to produce the most unhappy results. But there was another circumstance which must not be forgotten. It aggravated these evils unspeakably. It had a prime agency in the events which followed; of which agency you were directly the authors. This was the Mississippi stock, the fruit of the Yazoo compromise, upwards of four millions of which were issued by you, and made receivable in payment for lands in Alabama and Mississippi, and nowhere else. This stock, bearing no interest and owned chiefly in the East, was bought up at a large discount for the purpose of being invested in lands. It doubled the money of Alabama. It destroyed the salutary proportion between the circulating medium and the commodity in the market. It produced an artificial scarcity of land, and the high prices induced by scarcity. The holder of the stock thought himself warranted to bid beyond the specie value, to the extent of his discount, forgetting that the remaining instalments must, after the absorption of the stock, be paid in cash. Those who had no stock were compelled to go up to the stock price, or lose the lands on which they had fixed their affections.

The madness was general, it was epidemic. The most prudent and calculating men were carried away with the rest. Land was the philosopher's stone. To buy it was to be rich. Alas! the mines which it promised to the distempered fancy of the purchaser have proved to be like those of the fable on which repose the ends of the boy's rainbow. We have seen the consequence of this excessive excitement, this paroxysm of speculation—an enormous debt which never will be paid, which never can be paid. Yes, sir, I say it cannot be paid. The white population is about one hundred thousand. The debt is one hundred dollars each. Say that the sexes are equal, and the debt is two hundred dollars for every male. Say that the heads of families, the real buyers of the land, and the actual debtors, are twenty thousand, and the debt is five hundred each! And what is the situation of Alabama now, and what are her means of payment? Sir, it is a fearful question for her. Remember that you are told from high authority that the total currency of the Union has been suddenly reduced from one hundred and ten to forty-five millions of dollars, fifty-four per cent. more than one-half. The seventy banks whose paper inundated Alabama have shut up shop, or are curtailing their discounts, and pressing for payment of those very loans which they were so eager to make. What is left floating of Mississippi stock is nearly at par. Cotton has fallen to ten cents, and every thing else in the same proportion. But the paper which buys cotton at ten cents will not pay the debt of Alabama. You have repudiated the seventy banks. You will not receive their notes; and the planter who owes you must exchange one hundred dollars in these vile rags for eighty-five dollars of such as will pass muster at the land office. You must have specie or the paper of specie paying banks, and these are at a premium of fifteen per cent. This fact you have in a memorial on your table, and it is indisputably true. To expect payment of ten millions from a people so distressed is to expect impossibilities, is to call for a miracle which will not be wrought in our day. The Senate cannot have forgotten the strong expression of an eloquent gentleman, (Mr. KING, of New York,) whose long experience, rich and various attainments, and great abilities are so well known and appreciated, and whose opinions in regard to all questions touching the public lands, have always commanded respect and influence. Speaking on this subject at the last session, he said that the debt of Alabama grew out of "a contract which never would be enforced, which never could be enforced; forced, and which never ought to be enforced; and that, as an individual, if the case were his own, he could not, in equity and good conscience, enforce it." I rejoiced to hear him add, frankly and emphatically, that relief of some sort must be granted; and that, at the proper time, he would go all reasonable lengths to make that relief effective and ample. The time has arrived, and I call upon him to redeem his pledge, and I have no doubt that he will redeem it.

Once more, sir, to the bill. Without transfer, no reasonable man can expect a speedy extinguishment of the Alabama debt. To pay ten millions, according to the contract, is out of the question. Nor will your second section, which offers a premium for prompt payment, accomplish that object, because the money is not to be had. The committee contemplate a deduction of three-eighths from the balance due. The debt being $10,000,000, this discount would reduce it to $7,500,000, a sum certainly not within the power of the State to command by the 30th September next. It is clear to me that the principle on which the committee proceed, demands that the deduction should be made from the original price, the entire purchase money, since the current value of the whole land is lessened in that proportion by the change of system. If you legislate on that principle at all, as I think you ought, you should give it full scope; and I shall, at a proper time, move to amend the section accordingly. But, even suppose the amendment made, and a discount of thirty-seven and a half per cent. allowed on the original price, there would then remain to be paid upwards of six millions of dollars, a sum still far beyond the reach of the State within the limited period. You must resort, then, to other principles, or expect general forfeiture and distress. Transfer is one of those principles. It is best for you and for your debtor. Let us look at its operation. Let us assume that one-fourth only has been paid; and let us suppose, for the sake of illustration, what, however, is certainly not the fact, that all the lands are of equal value, and have cost the same price. Suppose half to be surrendered to the United States. This would reduce the debt one-half, viz: to five million dollars, and that without any deduction of price. Transfer the payment of one-fourth already made on the part surrendered, and apply it towards a discharge on the part retained, and the debt would then amount to $3,750,000, a prodigious difference, certainly; but even this sum could not be reasonably expected by the 30th September. This shows the necessity of calling in the last principle of the bill—the prolonged credit by instalments. And this is the more necessary for that meritorious class who have not the means of transfer, owning but one tract, and who will not be able to make prompt payment.

Sir, I repeat that the change of system imperatively calls upon you to grant relief. Many of the Representatives of the debtor States approved the change, and contributed by their votes to effect it. They thought the credit system injurious to the communities whose interests it was their peculiar province to guard. That system exhausted the new States, and kept them poor and in debt. Men laid out all their money in the first instalment, and staked their hopes and mortgaged their future earnings for the payment of the residue. The system quadrupled the power and inducement to buy, without increasing adequately the ability to pay. The quantity purchased was almost always measured by the amount of the first instalment. The new system deals not in hopes and fears; it leaves no man in suspense; it offers no check to the march of improvement. The purchaser feels erect and independent; he dreads no accident; he dreams not of forfeiture. He has the patent at once in his pocket; and the soil he tills is emphatically his own. He erects his cabin with a sturdy delight, and he sows in the confident hope of reaping the increase. Happy had it been for Alabama, in particular, had the change been made before August, 1817. How vastly different would have been her situation! She could have laid out no more money, for she laid out all; but she would have had her lands for the same money, and been free from debt; she would have had patents instead of certificates. The Representatives of the new States, therefore, gave their sanction to the change of system. But they warned you at the same time of the immediate and necessary effects of that change. The abolition of credit was not all. You reduced the price of your lands from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents the acre. They pointed out to you how this would affect former purchasers, and reduce the value of their lands; and they contended that this reduction gave those purchasers a fair and equitable claim to relief to the full extent of that deduction. The justness of the claim was not denied.

Mr. President, a word or two more, and I have done. It was proposed at the last session to incorporate the principles of relief in the bill then before the Senate. Gentlemen said, "No, it is not time yet. Change the system, and we will give you relief—reasonable, adequate, full relief. Put a stop to the further increase of the debt, and you shall have your own terms; but we will not embarrass the bill with any thing extraneous to the change, lest we endanger its passage. Call upon us next year, and your griefs shall be healed." Well, sir, we now make the call; we set forth our case. The President recommends relief; your Minister of Finance advises; your committee reports; the nation expects it. Individuals petition; nay, whole States supplicate your clemency, invoke your magnanimity, and demand the measure of a just and liberal equity at your hands. Their prosperity is also that of the Union, of which they are the fruit, and which they have gallantly defended with their blood. Nothing can give to foreign nations so grand and imposing an idea of your extent, your strength, and your resources, as this rapid expansion of the Republic, and the almost magical filling up of so many new States, won from the savage and the wilderness, for the use and habitation of freemen—your sons and brothers. Seven of these new States and two Territories await with solicitude the fate you are preparing for them. Your decree can make them flourish, or make them fade; can cripple them for a long series of years, or strike off the bonds which fetter them; cramping their young limbs, and retarding their free growth. It is for you now to determine whether they shall be stifled by the horrible incubus of this debt, which presses upon their vitals, paralyzing their energies, and arresting the wholesome play of their organs: whether they shall be crushed by this gigantic Colossus, which bestrides the vast and fertile region of the West, with one foot in the Gulf of Mexico, and the other I know not where—on the shores of the lakes, on the summit of the Stony Mountains, under whose "huge legs" your fellow citizens in that quarter "must peep about" to find the grave of their hopes and fortunes!

When Mr. W. had concluded—

Mr. MORRIS spoke briefly in support of the bill as it stood, and against recommitment.

On the question to agree to the above motion, Mr. SMITH asked to be excused from voting on this, and all other questions that may arise on said bill in the Senate, and stated as a reason why he should be excused, that, being a purchaser of public lands in Alabama, and not residing therein, he was interested in the provisions of the bill; and on the question to grant the leave asked, it was determined in the negative.

The question being taken on the motion to recommit the bill, it was negatived without a division.

Mr. THOMAS then offered a substitute for the first section of the bill, (not affecting any principle of the bill, but intended to render its meaning clearer,) which was ordered to be printed; and the Senate adjourned.

[The title covers a tract of thirty square leagues, and comes before Congress for confirmation by petition from Daniel W. Cox, who claims under the title of de Maison Rouge, and holds the greater part of the immense tract which that title embraces.]

The bill was accompanied by a long report from the committee, setting forth the facts of the case, and the principles on which the bill was predicated.

Mr. EATON spoke at some length against the bill, and the reasoning of the report.

The bill and report were supported by Mr. LOWRIE and Mr. VAN DYKE.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, offered an amendment to the bill, expressly to prevent its interference with any of the Spanish grants, which have been recommended for confirmation by the board of commissioners of the western land district of Louisiana, and since confirmed by Congress—and he spoke to show the necessity of such a provision in the bill. Whereupon, the bill was, on motion of Mr. KING, of Alabama, postponed to Friday.

The Senate again took up the bill granting relief to the purchasers of public lands prior to the 1st of July, 1820.

A good deal of discussion again took place on this bill, principally on amendments offered to it; none of which, however, of a material character, were agreed to. The bill was, after some time, again laid on the table.

SMITH, NOBLE, THOMAS, LOWRIE, HOLMES, of Maine, TRIMBLE, MILLS, EDWARDS, and TALBOT, principally engaged. The debate ended by postponing the bill, with the view of attempting some amendment to obviate the objections urged against it.

NATIONAL VACCINE INSTITUTION.

The Senate next took up the bill from the other House to incorporate the Managers of the National Vaccine Institution.

Mr. L. also adverted to the anticipated utility of the institution, and to some of the reasons in its support.

After some debate between Mr. ROBERTS, (who was opposed to the bill altogether, and not satisfied with the proposed amendment) and Mr. LLOYD, the amendment was adopted.

On the motion also of Mr. LLOYD, the bill was further so amended, as to require from the President of the Institution on oath an annual report of their property, funds, receipts, expenditures, &c., to the Secretary of the Treasury, and by him to be laid before Congress.

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, several other amendments were made to the details of the bill—amongst them an obligation on the managers to provide for the vaccination of indigent persons, free of any charge. Mr. L. having gone through the bill,

Mr. ROBERTS entered into a very general review of the provisions of the bill, to show their inadequacy to the objects contemplated by the friends of the measure, as well as their objectionable character in some respects; and having some doubts of the constitutionality of the bill in its present shape, which question, however, he did not discuss.

Mr. LLOYD rose to reply to Mr. R., when, on motion of Mr. TALBOT, the bill was laid on the table.

GRANT OF LAND TO LOUISIANA.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill for granting to the State of Louisiana a piece of public land in the county of Point Coupee, whereon to establish a school for the use of the people of that county. The bill was so amended yesterday as to grant to the State the pre-emption right only.

Mr. LLOYD moved to lay the bill on the table, that it might be taken up in connexion with the proposition to grant to the old States donations of the public lands for the benefit of education, corresponding to those which have been conferred on the new States, deeming the two subjects similar in their character.

Mr. BROWN spoke to show that the present bill had no connexion in principle with the important proposition referred to; that this was a small isolated piece of land necessary to the people of the county of Point Coupee for the purpose contemplated; that the State would be willing to pay for it the small sum which the minimum price would amount to, but that it would not be worth the cost of sending a United States surveyor one hundred miles to survey it, make out a plat, and set it up to sale, &c. He thought Congress might safely make a donation of it to the State, without danger of establishing any litigated principle; but that there could be no objection to the bill now, he thought, as it proposed simply to give the State a pre-emption right to the land, &c.

Mr. LLOYD replied to Mr. BROWN, and argued in support of the objections which he had at first suggested against acting on this bill now, which, if it were passed in its present shape, would be used as an argument against the proposition he had referred to.

The question being taken, the bill was ordered to lie on the table—ayes 22.

VIRGINIA MILITARY LANDS.

The bill from the other House for extending the time for locating Virginia military land warrants (for two years longer) was taken up in Committee of the Whole.

This subject gave rise, as usual when under consideration heretofore, to a good deal of discussion.

Mr. THOMAS briefly explained to the Senate the considerations in favor of extending the indulgence proposed by the bill.

Mr. KING, of New York, thought it was time that something explicit was done, as to the time when this subject should be closed, and some report made of the lands located, and those which remained for the disposal of the United States, &c. He gave a brief narrative of the circumstances which produced the reservation by Virginia, of the country between the Sciota and Little Miami, for satisfying her military land warrants. The body of land in Ohio, reserved by Virginia for this purpose, was of great extent, and the surplus belonged as much to the United States as any other land in that State; and it was time, he thought, that something was done to show what quantity was left—how this matter stood—and to begin to think of some termination to this long standing subject. Instead of passing this bill with an extension of two or three years; he would give but one year, with an understanding, that it would not be extended longer, unless some explanation should be given to justify it.

Mr. BARBOUR entered into a history of the subject, to show the difficulties which had impeded a final adjustment of this whole subject. He adverted to the cession made by Virginia to the Union, of all her immense northwestern possessions, presumed then to extend to the Pacific ocean, out of which territory she had reserved a tract for satisfying the pledge she had given to her Revolutionary officers and soldiers. This pledge was made as well to those of the State line as of the Continental line, but in the contract of cession and reservation, by some unknown means, the word State was omitted; and the Congress of the United States had taken advantage of this omission, in the face of the most conclusive circumstances, even its recognition of the principle, in one of the articles, to reject all applications to satisfy warrants of the State line. Mr. B. animadverted on this conduct, which he would not characterize by the epithet which would be applied to it in private life. Leaving this part of the subject, Mr. B. argued to show that most of the persons originally possessing these unlocated titles, being scattered far and wide, were either ignorant, or their descendants or heirs were ignorant, of their title; many of these were orphans, who would sooner or later learn their right, and claim it; that it would be cruel and unjust to foreclose them, &c., and he defended the bill as it stood.

Mr. TRIMBLE made some remarks explanatory of the circumstances of this reservation, and the course heretofore pursued by Congress, as well as by Virginia; the difficulties which had grown out of the conduct of Virginia herself, from turning out the surveyor appointed by the officers, &c., and to show the reasons why all the locations had not been made; one of which was that the Indian title to a great part of the tract between the Scioto and Miami had not until recently (a part of it as late as 1818) been extinguished, and which of course could not previously be located. He was decidedly of opinion that it would be great injustice in Congress to refuse ample time for the location of those warrants.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, thought this a question simply whether Congress would enforce the principles of the statute of limitations against the just claims of the poor war-worn soldier, or his friendless orphans. Against such a course he protested and reasoned. These claims had lost no part of their validity by delay; much less had they been forfeited; and he did not believe it could, he hoped it could not, ever become a serious question in Congress whether time should be allowed for them to be brought in.

Mr. THOMAS referred to the several acts of Congress on the subject, and spoke as to the legislative history of this subject, illustrative of the propriety and justice of extending the full time proposed.

Mr. RUGGLES, of Ohio, moved to strike out two years, and insert one year as the time of extension. He argued that those lands which were not taken up by the warrants, remained unsettled; and that the further extension of indulgence operated to prevent the populating of the country in question; that there ought to be some limit established to this indulgence, and he thought one year more would enable Congress to judge when this limit could be fixed, and a termination be put to this drawback on the settlement of the country.

The motion was opposed by Messrs. BARBOUR, TALBOT, and TRIMBLE; and it was negatived without a division.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and ordered to a third reading.

MONDAY, January 29.

TUESDAY, January 30.

The three bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and severally passed to a second reading.

The Senate took up the bill further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the customs, and spent some time in maturing its details.

In the course of its consideration, Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, submitted the views which governed him in proposing this measure, and referred to various facts touching probable abuses, in the illegal conversion of public funds to private emolument, to show the expediency of the bill, as well in regard to the prevention of these abuses, as to the object of retrenchment and economy. Before the bill was gone through—

On motion of Mr. LLOYD, who wished a little further time to examine its important provisions, the bill was postponed to Thursday.

The bill concerning Thomas Shields and others, passed through a Committee of the Whole, in which it was explained by Mr. PLEASANTS, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

RELIEF TO LAND PURCHASERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the purchasers of public lands. The question under consideration was an amendment offered by Mr. THOMAS, in substance, to extend the provisions of the bill to those who hold lands under the original purchasers from the public.

Mr. KING, of New York, submitted at large his views of the policy of this bill, and the reasons which claimed his support of it—stating his ideas of the mode and measure of relief proper to be granted to the different classes of purchasers, &c.

The amendment proposed by Mr. THOMAS was agreed to without a division.

Various other amendments were adopted on successive motions of Mr. THOMAS, making its provisions more extensively applicable to the various classes of purchasers; as well as in other features of its detail.

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, moved an amendment going to extend the proposed discount to the whole amount of purchase money, instead of merely on the sum remaining due: in support of which he referred to the reasons submitted by him some days ago in favor of such a provision.

A debate of some length took place on this proposition; in which it was opposed by Messrs. VAN DYKE, LOWRIE, and KING, of New York, and was defended by Mr. WALKER, of Alabama.

The proposed amendment was ultimately rejected without a division.

The blank in which to insert the discount contemplated to be allowed to these purchasers on their payments, Mr. THOMAS moved to fill with "thirty-seven and a half" per cent.

This motion produced likewise some debate, touching the proper deduction to be allowed, &c., Messrs. LOWRIE, and KING, of New York, opposing this amount.

The amendment was agreed to—19 to 11.

Mr. VAN DYKE moved an amendment, going to limit the extension of the credit to those who have purchased no more than two contiguous half quarter sections of land.

On this motion considerable discussion arose, in which Messrs. VAN DYKE, KING of Alabama, EDWARDS, KING of New York, and WILLIAMS of Mississippi, took part.

Before the question was taken on the motion the usual hour of adjournment had arrived; and, about 4 o'clock, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 31.

the Committee of Claims, on the petition of James Villere; and it was postponed to Friday next.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Public Lands, on the petition of Thomas Hardeman; and it was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, obtained leave to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Bioren and Fielding Lucas, booksellers; and also (after some discussion on the practicability of maturing any thing on so intricate a subject during the present session) from the further consideration of the inquiry referred to that committee, into the expediency of diminishing, equalizing, and establishing, the fees of district attorneys, clerks, and marshals, and other officers.

The engrossed bill concerning Thomas Shields and others was read the third time, passed, and sent to the other House for concurrence.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. DANA, from the select committee appointed to inquire into the propriety of reducing the compensation of the members of Congress, and also the salaries of the principal and other officers of the Executive Departments, at the Seat of Government, stated, that the committee had made all the necessary inquiries, and collected all requisite information from the different departments comprehended in the scope of their inquiry, from the year 1790 to the year 1820; that the committee had duly deliberated on the whole matter referred to them, and that not being able to agree on any specific report, embracing any system or measure of reduction, partial or general, it only remained to state this fact to the Senate, which he was instructed to do, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, that the Senate might be enabled thus early to take such further order on it as should to it appear expedient.

A good deal of debate arose on the question of thus discharging the committee from the subject.

It was opposed by Messrs. ROBERTS and SMITH, chiefly on the ground that, as a specific inquiry had been referred, a specific report, either for or against the object, ought to be made; that this mode of disposing of such an inquiry was an innovation on legislative custom; that, as the Chairman had, with great industry, collected a mass of information on the subject, it was proper to submit it to the Senate, with an opinion, no matter how concise, of the committee; that, as the committee had come to a decision on the subject-matter referred to them, that decision ought to be reported, &c. Mr. MACON thought the documents, at any rate, ought to be laid before the Senate, that it might have the same light on the subject as the committee had.

The motion to discharge the committee was supported by Messrs. DANA, STOKES, OTIS, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, for the reasons, generally, that, as the committee could agree upon no plan of reduction, they could come to no practical conclusion, and therefore could make no specific report or recommendation; that the committee had tried the question on one salary and amount of compensation after another, but a majority could not unite on any one point of reduction; that the information possessed by the committee would be (and was after the discussion commenced) laid before the Senate; that the mode now proposed, of discharging a committee which could do nothing, was the most proper, under the circumstances, the most Parliamentary and logical; that there was an incongruity in the committee's reporting it expedient to do nothing; that it would be competent still for any gentleman, who was dissatisfied with the result, to make any specific motion for reduction in any branch of the Government, &c.

The question being taken on discharging the committee from the further consideration of the subject, it was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dana, Edwards, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Mills, Noble, Otis, Parrott, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Brown, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Horsey, Hunter, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd, Lowrie, Macon, Morrill, Palmer, Pinkney, Pleasants, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Thomas, Tichenor, Trimble, Van Dyke, Walker of Alabama, and Williams of Mississippi—31.

Mr. DANA delivered in the following report:

The committee appointed to inquire into the propriety of reducing the allowances authorized by law for the two Houses of Congress, and for the Executive Departments, report: That they have made inquiry according to the resolution for their appointment, and do not consider it advisable at the present time to propose any reduction of legal allowances in the cases to them referred. The following resolution is accordingly submitted:

Resolved, That it is not expedient to reduce the compensation allowed by law for the respective Houses of Congress, and for the principal and other officers in the Executive Departments.

The report was read.

THE RELIEF BILL.

The Senate, resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of the purchasers of public lands—Mr. VAN DYKE's motion to amend the bill by limiting the credit to those whose purchases have not exceeded two contiguous half-quarter sections, being still under consideration.

The question was taken on this amendment without debate, and it was agreed to—16, to 12.

The Senate spent much much time in considering other amendments, as well of the original provisions as of additional provisions proposed to be inserted, with the view of rendering its enactments more clear, of guarding them against abuse, &c.; in the proposition and discussion of which Messrs. VAN DYKE, WALKER, of Georgia, KING, WALKER, of Alabama, EATON, KING, of New York, and TALBOT, took part. Of these propositions, the following, offered by Mr. EATON, as a new section, was the only one which affected or embraced any important principle:

And be it further enacted, That any purchaser of public lands who, previous to the — day of — last, had actually made a settlement on the same, shall be allowed a remission of all interest; and twenty-five per cent. discount on the amount yet unpaid, and shall pay for the residue in instalments of one, two, — years without interest: Provided, That the settlement of any one quarter section or legal subdivision of a fractional section, shall be deemed and held a settlement of all contiguous and adjoining quarter sections or legal subdivisions of fractional section, so by him, in his own right, held, and possessed, not exceeding one section.

This amendment was opposed for various reasons by Messrs. KING, of New York, TALBOT, VAN DYKE, and EDWARDS, as inexpedient, and incompatible with the original views which produced the bill, which it might endanger; and was advocated by Messrs. EATON, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on the general ground that the actual settlers and cultivators of public lands ought to be relieved, as well as the very large and very small purchasers, now only in the contemplation of the bill. Mr. TALBOT was in favor of confining the amendment to a half section; and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, was in favor of one section. Mr. LOWRIE thought the amendment unnecessary, and was willing to extend the class of small purchasers to half a section of land. Mr. EATON modified his amendment so as to extend it to one section of land. Before the question was taken on the amendment, it was with the bill laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The Senate then according to the order of the day took up the Bankrupt bill; but before any progress was made in it, the Senate adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 1.

Mr. OTIS presented the petition of Samuel Parker, of Massachusetts, praying that the patent heretofore granted to him for certain improvements in machinery, the limitation of which is about to expire, may be renewed; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel Allen, reported a bill for passing to the credit of Nathaniel Allen certain moneys by him disbursed in the public service; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, gave notice, that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a bill concerning the process of execution issuing from the sixth circuit court of the United States for the district of Georgia.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force an act, entitled 'An act to provide for persons who were disabled by known wounds received in the Revolutionary war, and for other purposes,'" reported it without amendment.

Mr. HORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the erection of a marine hospital at, or near to, the city of New Orleans, for the admission of sick and disabled seamen of the United States, and for the accommodation of sick and disabled boatmen who may descend the Mississippi river.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslonde;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Pierre Dennis De La Ronde; a bill, entitled "An act confirming the location of the seat of government of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes;" and a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to remove the land office in the district of Lawrence county, in the Territory of Arkansas;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The four bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and severally passed to a second reading.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslonde" was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. EATON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Andrew Peters and others, made a report, accompanied by a resolution that the prayer be not granted. The report and resolution were read.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Public Lands on the petition of Thomas Hardeman; and, on motion by Mr. EATON, it was laid on the table.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;" and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Samuel Tucker, late a Captain in the Navy of the United States; and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Louis Lauret, of New Orleans, praying to be admitted to the rights of citizenship earlier than is prescribed by law.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution to inquire whether any, and if any what, amendments are necessary and proper to be made to the act, entitled "An act relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of a vacancy in the offices both of President and Vice President," passed March 1, 1792, made a report that it is inexpedient at this time to legislate further on the subject.

Mr. SMITH from the same committee, to which was also referred the resolution to inquire whether any, and if any what, provisions are necessary or proper to be made by law to meet contingencies which may arise from unlawful, disputed, or doubtful votes, under that part of the twelfth article of amendments to the Constitution of the United States which relates to counting the votes of the Electors for President and Vice President of the United States, made a report that it is inexpedient at this time to legislate on the subject.

The resolution offered yesterday by Mr. CHANDLER was taken up and agreed to.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Governor of the State of Ohio, transmitting a report of the joint committee of the two Houses of the Legislature of that State on the proceedings of the Bank of the United States against the officers of the State in the United States circuit court.

Mr. RUGGLES moved that the letter and report be printed for the use of the Senate.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, and EATON, for the reasons that it was a document out of which no legislation could be expected to grow; that the Senate had no more to do with the report, or the case to which it related, than any other legislative proceedings of the States; that it came not from any branch of the General Government, but was in the nature merely of a private paper, which, however curious members might be to peruse, the Senate in its public capacity had nothing to do with it, &c. Mr. EATON moved, however, that it be referred to the Committee of Finance, to see if it was of a nature to make the printing of it necessary, it being so long that it had not been read in the Senate.

The motion to print was supported by Messrs. RUGGLES, TALBOT, and BARBOUR, on the ground generally that the report was transmitted directly from the government of the State of Ohio to the Senate, and that respect for that State required that the document should be treated in the usual way and be printed; that it was a document of an important character, relating to a subject of great national interest—one concerning which severe animadversions on the State of Ohio had been made throughout the Union; that it was a most able and ingenious argument of a great Constitutional question, deeply involving State rights, as well as the interest of the General Government.

The letter and report were finally referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

ALLOWANCE OF DRAWBACKS.

The report of the Committee of Finance unfavorable to the petitions of Paul Lanusse and of F. Bailly Blanchard, of New Orleans, (praying to be allowed certain drawbacks,) was taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to reverse the report, and to instruct the Committee on Finance to bring in a bill conformable to the prayer of the petitioners.

Mr. BROWN supported the motion by recapitulating the circumstances of the case, and offering several arguments to show that it was justly and reasonably entitled to the relief prayed. Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, also spoke in support of his motion, and in favor of relief for the petitioners.

Messrs. DANA, HOLMES of Maine, and LANMAN, defended the report, and maintained the expediency of enforcing the rules prescribed by the laws.

The motion to reverse the report was negatived—18 votes to 15.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, then moved to separate the two cases, by instructing the Committee of Finance to report a bill for the relief of F. Bailly Blanchard only.

After considerable debate, in which the motion was supported by Messrs. BROWN, JOHNSON of Louisiana, and MILLS, and was opposed by Messrs. LANMAN and HOLMES, this amendment was also negatived—19 to 16—and the report of the committee was concurred in.

RELIEF BILL.

The Senate went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of the purchasers of public land—the following additional section, offered yesterday by Mr. EATON, being still under consideration:

"And be it further enacted, That any purchaser of public lands, who, previous to the — day of — last, had actually made a settlement on the same, shall be allowed a remission of all interest, and twenty-five per centum discount on the amount yet unpaid; and shall pay for the residue in instalments of one, two, — years, without interest: Provided, That the settlement of any one quarter section, or legal subdivision of a fractional section, shall be deemed and held a settlement of all contiguous and adjoining quarter sections, or legal subdivision of fractional sections, so by him in his own right held and possessed, not exceeding one section."

This amendment was again debated at some length—Messrs. KING of New York, NOBLE, TALBOT, and VAN DYKE, opposing it for various reasons as impolitic, and at variance with the main object in view—the diminution of the debt;—and Messrs. EATON, RUGGLES, and SMITH, advocating it, as essential to render the bill just and impartial in its provisions. Mr. SMITH and Mr. KING of New York, entered more largely into this question, as well as into the policy of the bill generally, and of the proper mode and extent of relief.

Mr. KING, of Alabama, spoke in favor of the principle of the amendment, to which the only objection, in his opinion, was the difficulty of the discrimination.

The amendment was ultimately negatived without a division.

On motion of Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, a proviso was inserted in the bill substantially to make the new instalments of credit commence at the expiration of — years respectively from the days of purchase, in the cases of those whose final payments are not yet due.

The amendment adopted yesterday to confine the proposed extension of credit to those whose purchases have "not exceeded two contiguous half quarter sections," was, on motion of Mr. RUGGLES, reconsidered; and then

Mr. TALBOT moved to modify the amendment, so as to read "not exceeding four contiguous half quarter sections," and supported his motion by sundry arguments.

The modification was agreed to, and, in this shape, the amendment was again agreed to.

Some other amendments were offered, but, before any one of consequence was acted on, it had become late, and the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, February 2.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting a list of unproductive post roads; and the letter and list were read.

Mr. SANFORD presented the petition of William Vaughan, sailingmaster in the Navy, praying to be allowed prize-money for the destruction of two vessels of the enemy in the late war; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jacob Hunsinger, and the bill, entitled 'An act extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army,'" reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. LOWRIE, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Brady," reported it with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the memorial of Archibald Gracie & Sons, and others, reported a bill to extend the time for unloading vessels arriving from foreign ports in certain cases; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of the Bank of Potomac, reported a bill to extend the charter of the Bank of Potomac; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to establish the district of Pearl river," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, gave notice that, on Monday next, he should ask leave to bring in a bill to establish a new land office in the State of Mississippi, and for the better regulation of certain land districts in the States of Alabama and Mississippi.

The bill for passing to the credit of Nathaniel Allen certain moneys by him disbursed in the public service, and the bills from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act for the relief of Pierre Dennis De La Ronde;" "An act authorizing the President of the United States to remove the land office in the district of Lawrence county, in the Territory of Arkansas;" and "An act confirming the location of the seat of government of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes," were severally read the second time.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Pierre Dennis De La Ronde" was referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to remove the land office in the district of Lawrence county, in the Territory of Arkansas," and the bill, entitled "An act confirming the location of the seat of government of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes," were severally referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the memorial of Louis Lauret; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the memorialist be not granted, and that he have leave to withdraw his papers.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the resolution of the 13th of December, directing them to inquire if any, and what, provisions are necessary to be made by law to meet contingencies which may arise from unlawful votes under that part of the twelfth article of the amendment to the Constitution which relates to counting the votes of the Electors for President and Vice President, and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the resolution of the 13th of December, directing them to inquire if any, and what, amendments are necessary to be made to the act "relative to the election of President and Vice President of the United States, and declaring the officer who shall act as President in case of vacancies in the offices both of President and Vice President," and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, instructing the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures to inquire into the expediency of establishing a marine hospital at New Orleans; and agreed thereto.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Pensions on the memorial of Andrew Peters, and others, officers of the Revolutionary army; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer be not granted.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of James Villere; and it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate took up and considered, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing the sale of certain grounds belonging to the United States in the City of Washington, which was amended, and the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and, the amendments having been concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

ciary, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the clerk of the district court of the United States for the district of Louisiana, to appoint a deputy to aid him in the discharge of the duties of his office; and the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to alter the times of holding the district court in the northern district of New York," reported them severally without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. HOLMES, of Mississippi, it was agreed to reconsider the vote of yesterday on the report of the Committee on Finance on the memorial of Paul Lanusse and F. Bailly Blanchard; and it was laid on the table.

On motion, by Mr. VAN DYKE, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report to the Senate what proceedings have been had in relation to the claim of John H. Piatt, authorized to be liquidated and settled by an act of the 8th day of May, 1820; and that he report how, and upon what principles, reasons, and construction of the law, the said claimant attempts to support his claim.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill from the other House, to fix the Peace Establishment of the Army, reported a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS also laid on the table an estimate of the comparative expenses of the army, under the organization of the last mentioned bill, as it passed the House of Representatives, and that of the proposed substitute, which was read.

RELIEF TO LAND PURCHASERS.

The Senate resumed, in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to relieve the purchasers of public lands.

Mr. KING, of New York, after some remarks on the details of the bill, and explanatory of his ideas of the proper principles on which the proposed relief ought to be granted, to obtain the great object in view—the prospective abolition of the land debt, and the complete payment for all that portion of the land which shall be retained by the purchasers—suggested a substitute for the first section of the bill (which he had heretofore informally submitted to the Senate.)

Mr. ORIS stated the perplexity under which he labored, owing to the various principles that had been inserted in the bill, and the different doctrines which had been urged in the course of its protracted consideration; he therefore moved that the bill be recommitted to a select committee, that its details might be so digested as to promise the early and general concurrence of the Senate in the plan to be adopted.

Mr. LOWRIE and Mr. KING, of Alabama, thought certain points in the bill, yet undecided, ought to have the sense of the Senate expressed thereon before it should be recommitted; and Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, considered that all the principles of the bill ought to be previously settled by the Senate, and proceeded at some length to controvert in part the opinions advanced by Mr. KING, of New York. Messrs. RUGGLES, NOBLE, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and EDWARDS, opposed any recommitment, as promising nothing valuable in smoothing the way of the bill; and the certain effect would be delay. Messrs. KING, of New York, and VAN DYKE advocated the recommitment, from a belief that it would accelerate its consummation, and produce a greater degree of unanimity in its passage, &c.

The motion to recommit the bill was negatived: ayes 13, noes 20.

Mr. THOMAS moved that the number of annual instalments by which the debt remaining due shall be discharged, be eight.

Mr. EATON was opposed to so long a credit, and argued to show the propriety of a more limited number of instalments. Messrs. RUGGLES, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, NOBLE, and EDWARDS, advocated the motion to fill the blank with eight years, as an extent of credit, under the circumstances of the times, and the condition of forfeiture annexed, no more than proper.

The motion to fill the blank with eight, was agreed to without a division.

On motion of Mr. TALBOT, a new section was inserted in the bill, (similar to a provision offered previously by Mr. VAN DYKE,) principally further to secure the terms of the act from evasion or imposition.

Mr. SMITH moved to add the following section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That all sums due, or which may hereafter become due, to the United States, on account of any purchase of public lands heretofore made, may be discharged by — equal annual instalments, which shall be paid on the first day of December in each successive year, together with so much interest as shall have accrued on each instalment from the time such instalment became due, according to the terms of the original sale. And upon the failure of any such purchaser to pay any of the aforesaid instalments on the day that such instalment shall become due, the said land on which such instalment shall be due shall be forfeited to the United States: Provided, That any person or persons taking the benefit of this provision shall be excluded from all other benefits offered by this act.

Mr. S. deemed this the only legitimate or salutary provision which could be made by Congress for the alleviation of the public land debtors, and argued at some length in support of his proposition.

The question was taken on this amendment, without further debate, and was negatived—ayes 10.

The blank in the bill, left to fix the period at which payment of any sum due, or becoming due, must be made, to entitle the purchaser to the discount of thirty-seven and a half per cent. on such payment, was, after some debate as to the time most expedient, filled with the first day of April, eighteen hundred and twenty-two.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, as amended, and all the amendments agreed to without objection, except that one which fixes the discount to be allowed for the prompt payment at thirty-seven and a half per cent.

This amendment Mr. LOWRIE moved to substitute with the deduction of twenty-five per cent.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

This motion was negatived, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Dickerson, Horsey, Hunter, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Macon, Mills, Morrill, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Roberts, Sanford, Smith, Tichenor, and Van Dyke—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, King of Alabama, Lloyd, Noble, Ruggles, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Walker of Alabama, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Mississippi—21.

The bill was then, on motion of Mr. MACON, recommitted to the Land Committee, with the view of revising merely its phraseology, and to report any corrections of form which may be rendered necessary therein by the various modifications which it has undergone in the Senate.

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, February 5.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill further to establish the compensation of the officers of the customs, and for other purposes, and spent some time in maturing its details; after which, it was further postponed until to-morrow.

COMPENSATION TO MEMBERS.

The Senate took up the report of the select committee, appointed on the subject, adverse to the propriety of at this time making any reduction in the compensation of the members of Congress, or officers of the Executive Departments.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend the report by striking out the resolution of the committee, and inserting the following matter as a substitute:

"Resolved, That hereafter the compensation of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the delegates from territories, ought to be — dollars for every day they shall respectively attend on their duties, and — dollars for every twenty miles they may necessarily travel, respectively, in going to and returning from any session of Congress; and that the compensation of the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives ought to be — dollars for each and every day they may perform the duties of their respective offices.

"Resolved, That, from and after the thirty-first day of March next, the salaries of the Secretaries of the Departments of State, of the Treasury, of War, and of the Navy; the Attorney General of the United States; the Register; the first and second Comptrollers; the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth Auditors of the Treasury; the Commissioner of the General Land Office; the Board of Commissioners for the Navy; the Postmaster General; the Assistant Postmasters General; and the salaries of all clerks employed in the several Executive departments of the Government, including those in the General Post Office, which amount annually to a sum exceeding eleven hundred and fifty dollars, ought to be reduced — per centum on the said annual amount."

The amendment was ordered to be printed, and the further consideration of the report was then, after some debate, postponed to Monday the 19th instant.—Ayes 23, noes 18.

JAMES VILLERE.

The Senate took up the report of the Committee of Claims, unfavorable to the petition of James Villere, who prays remuneration for the destruction of his sugar crop, and other damages sustained, by the operations of the American army in defence of New Orleans in 1814 and 1815.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to reverse the report, and to direct the Committee of Claims to bring in a bill for the relief of the petitioner. Mr. J. spoke at some length in opposition to the report, and in favor of his motion.

Mr. ROBERTS supported, in a speech of considerable length, the correctness and justice of the report.

Mr. BROWN opposed the report, and argued some time to show that the relief claimed by the petitioner was entirely reasonable and just, and ought to be granted.

The question being taken on the proposed amendment, it was decided in the negative, without a division; and the report of the Committee of Claims was concurred in by the Senate.

COMMODORE TUCKER.

The Senate then again took up the bill for the relief of Commodore Samuel Tucker, authorizing him to be placed on the list of invalid pensioners, at $50 a month; on which bill a long and wide debate took place.

Mr. SMITH opposed this bill on principle; admitting the merits of Captain T., but arguing that, if really an invalid and unable to maintain himself, there was already provision made by law to embrace his case and afford relief; that, if not an invalid, this bill ought not to pass, the system of pensioning for public services merely being bad in itself, and still worse in its tendency. Mr. S. also went into an examination of the circumstances alleged in the case of the applicant, to show that they did not justify the passage of the bill; that the applicant had been already, long since, uncommonly well provided for by the public, to support which he referred to resolves of Congress, &c.; that, affording this gratuitous relief to the applicant, would be treading on the rights of thousands of other citizens equally meritorious, &c.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, replied to Mr. S., and submitted a number of arguments, in addition to those which he used when the bill was before under consideration, in support of it; referring to the long and singularly successful services, and the highly gallant conduct of Commodore T. during the Revolutionary war, and his present reduced circumstances and great age, to establish the justice of granting him a maintenance out of the navy pension fund; that fund being expressly pledged to afford relief in such cases as the present.

Mr. SMITH replied, and contended that this very pension fund was intended to provide for disabled seamen, and not for those who were not disabled; that Commodore T. did not come within the description, and therefore was not entitled to be distinguished from all the other honorable and brave men who have grown old since they signalized themselves in the Revolution. He argued also, (in reply to a remark of Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, the other day,) that the statute of limitations was a just law, as well as a wise and prudent one.

Mr. CHANDLER made a remark or two in reply to Mr. SMITH.

Mr. KING, of New York, placed this case on a footing with a few others of the Revolutionary class, particularly that of General Stark, for whom a bill passed at a recent session. He adverted to some of the prominent features of Commodore T.'s Revolutionary services, and contended that it was not just or equitable that a veteran of the Revolution such as he, in want now of the means of support, should ask relief in vain. There was no danger, he argued, from such a course; for, however natural the prejudices in this country which existed against the pension system, they arose from the abuses practised in Great Britain, where pensions were lavished by the Crown upon favorites of every kind, often without regard to public services or private virtues. There was no danger of such an abuse in this country. The justice of military pensions had been settled in this country; it was a power delegated to the Government by the Constitution; and there was no risk of its abuse in a Government constituted as ours, as the people, holding the corrective, would always apply a remedy if the practice was ever carried beyond its just and proper limits.

Mr. SMITH, after subjoining a few remarks, moved to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. MACON observed, that nothing would be more curious than a history of the pensions of this country; the practice was constantly getting wider and wider; but it had been well said, the history of the country was lost. He referred to the circumstances of the first pensions and those granted since, to show the regular extension of the principle beyond the limits at first deemed right. A rule was always found for a new case, and the case gave rise to a new rule, so that the principle was constantly stretching. He was opposed to this course, and argued briefly against it.

Mr. DANA spoke to show that there was no principle opposed to the case of Commodore T., and that the relief ought to be granted, as it might be done without danger of exceeding the just limits to which Congress were authorized to go by the spirit and principles of our Government.

Mr. ROBERTS opposed this pension on principle, for the same reasons that he opposed the pension of General Stark. He observed, that if pensions were granted for military services, without disability, it was not far removed, and would not long be distinguished from civil pensions, which would probably follow; and argued to show the evil tendency of authorizing pensions in cases like the present, which could not justly be distinguished from a civil pension.

Mr. PLEASANTS stated the ground on which the Naval Committee reported the bill, which was intended to give Commodore T. the amount of half-pay for a certain period, to which he was strictly entitled; to show which Mr. P. adduced the facts of the case.

Mr. OTIS maintained that the case of Commodore T. entitled him, strictly, to avail himself of the benefits of the navy pension fund; that the bill called for no new grant of money out of the Treasury; that it violated no principle; and that it did not become a magnanimous legislature to withhold this boon from him, to which he was so signally entitled in justice and gratitude.

Messrs. SMITH and MACON added a few remarks, and Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, also a few, in addition to what he had said the other day in support of the claim, declining to go again at large into the case, as it had been so ably supported.

The motion to postpone the bill indefinitely was negatived—yeas 13, nays 24.

After an unsuccessful attempt of Mr. ROBERTS to reduce the proposed allowance to $20 a month, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

TUESDAY, February 6.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement by the Second Comptroller, of the appropriations for the service of the year 1820, showing the amount expended, and the balance remaining unexpended, on the 31st of December last; and the letter and statement were read.

Mr. THOMAS communicated a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois; which was read, as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the General Assembly of the State of Illinois, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to endeavor to obtain the passage of a law, so amending the act of the last session of Congress, entitled 'An act to authorize the appointment of commissioners to lay out the road therein mentioned,' as that the said road may be surveyed and laid out through the seats of government of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois; Provided, The commissioners to have been appointed by that act have not yet performed the duties enjoined upon them by the same; but that, if in case they have made the survey contemplated by said act, they endeavor to obtain the passage of one authorizing a new survey, and lay out the said road through the seats of government of the said States.

"JOHN McLEAN,
"Speaker of the House of Reps.

"GEO. CALDWELL,
"Speaker of the Senate, pro tem."

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives, to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, and of notifying the persons elected of their election.

On motion of Mr. THOMAS, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from the consideration of the reports of the land commissioners at St. Helena Courthouse in Louisiana, and at Jackson Courthouse in Mississippi.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, said he had not opposed the motion, knowing the mass of business the committee had before them; but he sincerely regretted that the committee had not time to act on the subject. He entered into an examination of the nature of the reports, and the character of the claims embraced in them; and urged the importance of acting on the subject at the present session. With that aim, Mr. J. moved that the reports be referred to a select committee.

The reference was opposed by Messrs. EATON, LOWRIE, and ROBERTS, principally on the ground, that it was now too late in the session to act definitively on a subject of such difficulty and importance.

Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, Mr. BROWN, and Mr. EDWARDS, replied, and pressed the reference.

The motion was adopted, and the following committee appointed: Mr. JOHNSON of Louisiana, Mr. WALKER of Alabama, Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, Mr. EATON, and Mr. LOWRIE.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the President of the United States to remove the land office in the district of Lawrence county, in the Territory of Arkansas;" and the bill, entitled "An act confirming the location of the seat of government of the State of Illinois, and for other purposes;" reported them severally without amendment.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law for the allowance and payment of the claim of David Cooper, for property taken for military services during the late war, by order of Captain C. H. Holden.

Mr. HOLMES, of Mississippi, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of complying with the request made by the chiefs of the Choctaw tribe of Indians, to grant tracts of land to certain individuals named in the documents which accompanied the Message of the President of the United States, transmitting to the Senate the treaty concluded at Doakes, on the 18th day of October, in the year 1820.

The bill for the relief of Samuel Tucker, late a Captain in the Navy of the United States, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Manuel and Isaac Monsanto, deceased; and the bill to authorize the reconveyance of a tract of land to the city of New York; were severally read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Finance on the petition of John Lowden; and it was postponed until tomorrow.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Public Lands on the petition of Thomas H. Boyles; and, in concurrence therewith, the Committee on Public Land were discharged from the further consideration of the subject, and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of George Jackson; and it was postponed until tomorrow.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. VAN DYKE spoke in exposition of the principles of the bill.

Mr. ROBERTS having moved to strike out the first section of the bill, rose, and said, that he ought to offer an apology for entering into this debate, if it could be supposed at all proper, in the situation he now stood. He was about to discuss a subject with which he was little familiar; one to which, until very lately, his inquiries had not extended. When the subject had been up in former sessions, he had waited for light from those who were movers of it. Having at all times entertained impressions of great doubt as to the propriety of adopting a bankrupt system, he had been led hesitatingly to countenance a proposition from his honorable friend from Delaware, (Mr. VAN DYKE,) at the last session, calculated to operate on all insolvents above a very small amount. The friends of such a bill as this, then joined in opposition, and it fell: but why my friend should have abandoned a scheme so liberal and congenial with the principles of equal justice, for such an one as that now before us, I have yet to learn. If I had doubts about that, I have none about this. I think it utterly repugnant to the first principles of our Government, as indeed I do every system of bankruptcy that will impair the obligation of contracts, in any shape or form. I give the gentleman full credit, when he assures us he thinks the interests of the country call for this measure. Knowing his correct feelings and great moral worth, I cannot ascribe the change of his opinions since the former session to a less solemn conviction. With equal sincerity, I believe the most mischievous consequences must flow from this project. The first object of which is, we are told, to protect the right of creditors; and, second, to shield the innocent though unfortunate debtor. If, with a proper exercise of legitimate legislative authority, these ends could be consistently obtained, it would be desirable to proceed. It becomes my duty to show they cannot be obtained either by the bill or by adopting such a bankrupt system as gentlemen seek by any the most ingenious exercise of the legislative power.

Gentlemen may talk as much as they please about the protecting of the rights of creditors; that has never been, nor never can be, the object of a system that intends to discharge the debtor from the obligation of his contract without fulfilling it, or without the free concurrence of all his creditors. Originally, bankrupt laws went merely to seize and apply the property of insolvents, summarily to the payment of their creditors, before it should be wasted entirely. Bankrupt laws were introduced into England in innovation of the common law, and, for the first two hundred years of their operation, no idea ever occurred of applying them to release the debtor from his contracts. The insolvent laws, also an innovation upon the common law, of a century later introduction, were, from the beginning, allowed to work this effect. The first English bankrupt act that provided for entire discharges was not enacted till about 1708. From that time the original purpose of the law has been lost in effect, and almost abandoned in purpose. I owe these to the obliging suggestions of my honorable friend from Rhode Island, (Mr. HUNTER,) whose views on these subjects, in the case of Sturgis vs. Crowninshield, I have read with equal profit and approbation. But I contend this bill promises little to the creditor, while the debtor is secure of his discharge from his contracts, whether a dividend be made or not. We had a right to anticipate strong appeals to the generous sympathies of our nature in favor of the innocent and unfortunate trader. That there are cases highly compassionate, I am bound to suppose; as bad as men may be generally, there are still some consolatory exceptions. If the gentleman will present me a scheme to relieve such, that shall not carry in its train as certainly as cause follows effect, an increase of, and impunity to, knavery, perjury, and the most atrocious iniquities, I will co-operate with him with alacrity. The scheme he proposes will discharge ten villains for one honest man. I say it will do it, because it has done it. On this point we have history, not theory; and demonstration, not hypothesis. The system offered us is substantially the English system, and of the results of that system, after a trial of three centuries, I shall have occasion presently to speak. It becomes men legislating for a great community not to be betrayed too easily, even by the syren song of compassion, into the most baneful expedients. We are told, on this measure, there is no Constitutional difficulty. Certainly we have substantial powers to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcy. But, whether or not it is necessary to use that power, we are left soberly to judge. It is equally in our discretion in what form we shall apply that power. It certainly is not indispensable in the establishment of uniform laws of bankruptcy, that the debtor should be discharged from future liability for his contracts. This, I have shown, was not the purpose of such laws originally, nor is it necessarily to be concluded that this was an object with the framers of the Constitution. Though wise and experienced men, there was scarcely any experience of bankrupt laws in the country. On the most extended construction, it is but barely possible. They left it entirely optional with Congress to mould these laws by such enactments as wisdom might dictate. The States are not restrained from passing bankrupt laws, so far as Congress may not exercise the power; though they are restrained from passing laws impairing the obligation of contracts. Congress are charged with the highest conservatory powers delegated by the Constitution. The defence of the country, for example, against foreign aggression and domestic violence. It was well understood, that, in the progress of time, emergencies might arise when all would have to submit to the law of necessity. The Constitution is therefore wisely silent on some points of power in the General Government. The citizen is secured against bills of attainder, corruption of blood, and ex post facto laws. While the States are denied the power of impairing the obligation of contracts, emitting bills of credit, coining money, or making tender laws, these, with the power of raising armies and navies, loaning and appropriating moneys for their support, are left in the discretion of Congress. This discretion ought always to be regulated by the great laws of moral obligation. What powers are forbidden to the States ought to be used with the greatest caution by the United States. Nothing in ethics is more strictly enjoined than the inviolability of contracts; and the case must be very strong indeed that will justify the Congress in impairing them. Considering them consecrated by the most sacred moral sanction, it is our duty to inquire whether, by justly perhaps providing for the releasing of an innocent man from a pressure of obligation he has neither hope nor faculty to extinguish himself, you will not inundate the country with fraud and villainy. It is my conscientious opinion it will be the result. Though this bill is substantially the former law of the United States, it is more ambiguous as to when and to what extent it is to go into effect. If it is to affect transactions past, I not only doubt, but deny, its constitutionality. It proceeds on the ground that bankruptcy is a criminal act; in its nature it often is so.

SENATE,

The Bankrupt Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

This bill is avowed to be intended to take immediate effect, and of course so far as a commission of bankruptcy is a punishment, the law will be ex post facto. But, what will be the confusion and injustice this kind of legislation will produce? Look at the details of the bill; not only will the bankrupt be discharged from his contracts, but men who have dealt with him with equal fairness, will, some, be allowed to prove (for recovery) their debts, while others, merely from the retrospective character of the law, will be denied. I can see nothing but the most monstrous injustice, likely to result from making such a law close upon dealings already had. All laws affecting rights ought to be prospective. Every thing ought to have time to conform to them, especially those which enter most deeply into the transactions of trade. More remedial laws may sometimes wisely and salutarily apply to the existing state of things. But even those will be found most frequently to promise much more benefit applied prospectively. We are told "the principles of this bill are happily adapted to the situation of the country. That it is confined to proper traders; to such as incur risks other 'classes are exempted from.' This will be found I think otherwise. It is confined to traders in merchandise of every kind, and exchange, while large classes of dealers, in equally hazardous business, are absolutely excluded. What risk does the mere retailer incur that the builder of ships and houses, or the manufacturer of leather, shoes, hats, clothes, and manufacturers generally, do not incur; to say nothing of a variety of other professions? Credit is as necessary in business to one as to the other. The principles of our Government are opposed to this sort of immunity. Why, let me ask, are a particular profession to be provided with the means of an entire escape from their debts, a comparatively few in number, even of insolvents, while the great mass, at least equally meritorious, are to be chained to perpetual liability? Why is this beneficent system you offer, only applicable to a favored few? for, when you leave the narrow confines of navigation and maritime commerce, and foreign exchange, no reason exists why the middle-man, retailer, factor, and broker, should have a boon you do not extend to other more meritorious classes, who of necessity accept and give credit. If your system does not reach all, it does not suit us; as we are not a people of castes and classes. Gentlemen must show some better reason than alleged extraordinary risks for a claim of partial legislation. The truth is, the whole system is unsound. It is intrinsically vicious, and it is feared to attempt it on a general scale. These we must take for the reasons of the proposed limitation of its benefits until better reasons are assigned than we have yet heard. We are told our unfortunate merchants are rendered useless. Many of them hold property that ought to be given up. Human nature must very much change before it is reasonable that men who now fraudulently withhold property from their creditors will, under the proposed system, freely yield it up. Exemption from liability for debts, where there is no disposition to fraud, is a great boon, but a greater when it can be obtained with assured opulence. We know that it has long been proverbial that at the custom-house a peculiar doctrine of ethics prevails. The legal sanctions are not always sufficient to restrain perjuries. High duties we are told will not always increase the revenue. These are found to work a premium for fraud. You now propose the highest temptation to cupidity, and my word for it there are the seeds in this bill for a plentiful harvest. Relief is contemplated for the innocent, but to get at him you must pass the imprudent, extravagant, and vicious one. Do not tell me that your commissioners, your searches, your examinations, your oaths, and your sanctions, will purify and refine such into virtue and innocence. On the one hand we are told if we do not act we shall give up the blameless to depravity and despair; but if we do act, the inevitable result must be to reward and protect the dissolute. The gentleman reminds us we prospered by a state of neutrality in a belligerent world, but that the scene is changed. Look, says he, at the list of sufferers from seizures and confiscations abroad, and embargoes and restrictions at home; from bank accommodations, and endorsements, which have produced wide-spread ruin. The panacea for all these evils is a bankrupt law. But, then, this compassionate appeal extends only to a small class of traders, while the thousands of insolvents, involved in the vortex of ruin by the intemperate speculators in trade, are consigned over to the "confusion of insolvent laws," as the gentlemen terms them, to uselessness and despair. We are asked if the confusion of State legislation on insolvencies is a fit situation for a commercial people. Certainly, till we are shown a better. I am free to say I greatly prefer it to the scheme now proposed; to any scheme which shall not extend to insolvents generally; indeed to any bankrupt scheme that shall vest such arbitrary powers in a few men, sitting, as it were, in private, and where the security against fraud lies in oaths, the abuse of which is opposed by feeble because uncertain sanctions.

We are reminded that we deal much with nations where bankrupt laws prevail—where American creditors are paid, pro rata, while the foreign merchant has it in his power perpetually to harass the American debtor. To talk of dividends in bankruptcies, where the certificate is the object, as it must ever be, where discharges are provided for, is mockery. The American insolvent, when released, personally, has little to fear of trouble or cost from his foreign creditor, however vindictive. Distance and the unprofitableness of the attempt will preclude it. But, we are informed, bankrupt laws make men honest. It happens, though these laws are somewhat a novelty among us, that this assertion can be tested and denied by stubborn history.

The country, whose system it is desired we should adopt, has had a long trial of it. I shall recur presently to the tests of her experience. As to the decision of the courts of law of the United States, on the subject of the power of the States to discharge from liability, prospectively, I consider it as yet very far from being the settled law of the land. But, suppose it be granted: I still hold, no mode of discharge but one fairly and voluntarily granted by the creditor ought to be allowed. The attempt has been abundantly proved to be an embarkation on the sea of iniquity, without rudder or compass. My friend from Delaware anticipates objections to his system: that it will tempt the dishonest debtor to fraud and cover him with impunity. But he says the bill shuns the shock of the British system, the great error of which is in the severity of its sanctions. Humanity, he says, revolts at punishment so disproportioned. In this country, penalty of death is scarcely applied to any crime but that of taking human life or putting it in imminent jeopardy. The fraudulent taking of property can never justify it. But the gentleman will find, in the evidence taken before the committee of the House of Commons, in 1818, that it is very far from being supposed the unfrequency of prosecutions, for crimes committed under the bankrupt laws, is wholly due to aversion to see the penalty inflicted. It arises from the discouragements a loss of time and incurment of expense presents, together with the uncertainty of conviction. These things will be found to attend prosecutions where convictions would incur a milder punishment. But I will touch this subject further in the examination of the bill. But, says the gentleman, the committee of the House of Commons do not recommend a repeal of the bankrupt laws. Ay, and I will add, they forbear even to recommend all the changes they think are necessary. Need I tell the gentleman that systems of three hundred years' standing are not easily rooted up when they are found to be evil. There is a great difference, let me tell him, between abolishing systems and adopting them. We go upon the principle of equality of privilege among the citizens, of keeping the civil power above the military, of separating civil from religious establishments. What other country has done this? We have found all the blessings to result from following these great maxims we expected. You would, even in these days of revolution, be surprised to see a British House of Commons recognising them, not because they are not true, but because, before she could, she must reform her whole Constitution of Government, which the boldest would hardly dare to attempt, but from dire necessity. I confess I do not like a bankrupt system, from the machinery which seems necessarily to belong to it. You must have a chancellor, commissioners, solicitors, clerks, assignees, messengers, and a long train of persons armed with monstrous powers, and absorbing such an amount of fees as must necessarily, in nine cases out of ten, leave nothing for the creditors. This is an objection to a bankrupt system that no legislation can obviate, and a much better alternative is presented in not legislating at all, but to let every man take care of his own business, under the laws regulating property, which surely no country ever had more abundant or safer means of enacting. The defects of the British system, says the gentleman, are healed in the bill before you. This we shall be better able to judge when we have reviewed the bill. We find, however, after three hundred years' trial in that country, and multiplied modifications by the legislative power, so late as 1818, an inquiry into the administration of the British bankrupt laws results in the most perfect demonstration that its whole history is a continued scene of increasing iniquities and enormities. An entire change is deemed desirable; an essential one is earnestly urged. It is true the bill differs from the British system; the difference in the situation of the two countries does not admit of all the principles that apply there.

This bill, as I have before said, rests substantially on British precedent, and is very nearly a copy of the law of 1800. The minutes which I shall presently recur to are of recent date, and will illustrate the effects which must inevitably flow from such a system. The scheme will be found unsound at bottom; what is evil in principle cannot, by any exercise of legislation, be turned to good. The system before us will be found liable to many objections intrinsically belonging to it, and altogether incurable. The bill is, in many parts, vague and ambiguous; its sanctions are not definite; and a variety of trusts are reposed which cannot be enforced. The innocent, though unfortunate trader, may be persecuted and ruined with impunity, where the fraudulent one can hardly fail to get his discharge from all liability for his debts. If this is not found to be the case, then, indeed, am I very far from having read the bill profitably. Your former law was limited to five years; it went off by euthanasia in three. No voice was raised in defence of it. It is true it was not repealed by a Congress of the same politics that enacted it. Its blessings could not have been very apparent, or its repeal would hardly have anticipated its limitation. It failed as a bankrupt system everywhere had failed. They belong to the lumber of other species of Governments, and are of the same family with privileged orders and State religion. Now, let us take a brief review of the bill. On the face of the first clause no certain construction can be had, as to when it is to go into operation, or how it is to effect existing insolvencies.

The purpose of the bill is avowed to be, to relieve existing insolvencies. All the confessions of judgment and assignments to favored creditors which have been made are to be confirmed and sanctioned. Can it be pretended that a man who has notoriously paid some creditors to the prejudice of the rest, can ever be entitled to a certificate of bankruptcy discharging him from future liability, when a pro rata dividend, the great object of a commission of bankruptcy, is impossible? Yet, by this bill, such will surely get it; and it is intended for that purpose, as we shall presently see. Persons owing debts to a certain amount, using the trade of merchandise by buying and selling, dealing in exchange or marine insurance, are, by this bill, made the subjects of a commission of bankruptcy; but then, farmers, graziers, drovers, dyers, bleachers, shoemakers, carpenters, ship-carpenters, butchers, tailors, bakers, schoolmasters, inn-keepers, or any artificer whose living is got with some mixture of buying and selling, are excluded. These exclusions are as unjust as they are capriciously grouped. A man must suppose himself insolvent before he will commit or be involved involuntarily in a charge of bankruptcy. What will then be his object or hope from it? Exoneration from his debts at best; but, if he be not honest, exoneration and the retention of all he can. The certificate is the legitimate object of all. Now, why shall the middle man, the retailer, the factor, have the boon of exoneration denied to drovers, graziers, bleachers, carpenters, ship-carpenters, farmers, schoolmasters, &c.? Must not all these professions necessarily often take and give extensive credits? Much more so than some of the included classes. In fact, many of these are not only buyers and sellers, but factors of very extensive dealings. Why is that most important class, the manufacturers of flour, not even mentioned, and the dealer in lands, though brokers in other business are? I have known a large capital embarked in the establishment of a school, which, from the turn of times, has failed; and a person so failing is, surely, not less worthy of sympathy from the nature of his undertaking. There is no ground of justification for these exclusions. Every body must suffer from the exoneration of bankrupts; why, then, is one class to be favored more than another? Are gentlemen afraid of their own principles? The bill admits no other inference. The President is to appoint as many general commissioners of bankruptcy in each judicial district as he may deem necessary. The President, remark, without check or control. The Governor of Pennsylvania so appoints justices of the peace, and the consequence is, that, by a late report, they are multiplied to a most injurious extent. In these times, I expect the President will have applications enough. He cannot know the applicants, and the appointments will not be the better for that. The number, too, is in his discretion. With all the virtue and prudence I rejoice to believe he possesses, I look for nothing from him above good intentions, under the common frailties of man. The commissioners are to receive a per diem allowance for their services. The object of the office must be profit, rather than honor; and here you have a pledge that business will not be turned away. Concerted bankruptcies will afford as good profit as any others, as the commissioners are to be assured of their fees, whether there be a dividend or not. Well, the commissioners are to be sworn; they are then "to proceed, as soon as may be, to execute the commission, and, upon sufficient cause appearing, declare the bankruptcy." The party charged is to have notice, and may have, on demand, a trial by jury. This is pretended to be a security against malicious petitions, for concerted ones will never involve a wish to contest. The party may, before or at the time of examination, demand a trial of the fact by a jury. What situation will he be in while this is in contest? His business is suspended; he is threatened with ruin. He obtains a verdict; and what then? Has he any remedy against his prosecutor? The bill does not provide it, however, against the commissioners from wrong intent or error; his only redress seems to be the verdict. This wrong will have emanated from a tribunal sitting in a by-place, whose proceedings are not exposed to the purifying eye of public observation. Next comes the power of this secret commission to issue their warrant of seizure against the bankrupt, and his doors, and the doors of any dwelling-house supposed to contain him, are to be forced, on demand first being made. The exercise of these powers, by the regular judicial authority in criminal cases, is not without features of objection in the eyes of a free people. But they must be odious when resorted to by a tribunal which never can have the respect and confidence of the American public. Again, these three commissioners—and the chances are much against their being always the wisest or most discreet men—may, on what they deem probable cause, shown on oath, direct any person—mind, it is any person—in the day time, to break open houses, chests, trunks, &c., to come at the bankrupt's goods and writings. Now, if resistance be made, is there any power to call out the posse, and what is to be done with those who resist? The bill is silent. If this power be put in operation, the public feeling will not sustain it; without it, your tribunal is an object of contempt. The bankruptcy being declared, the commissioners are to take possession of his property, &c., and shall cause them to be safely kept until assignees be chosen, in manner hereinafter provided; that is, as often as they shall see fit, shall appoint one or more assignees to take care of the property until the meeting of the creditors. They shall then deliver it over, or forfeit five thousand dollars. I apprehend the commissioners will rarely see fit to appoint such assignee; because few men will be found willing, without fee or reward, to incur the risk. A man worth nothing might be induced to accept; for the forfeiture is the only consequence of embezzlement, which he will laugh to scorn; therefore, all the evils of embezzlement may be expected in the English system. Legislation cannot devise remedies against these abuses. Three principal things are to be done in commissions of bankruptcy; the appointment of assignees, the proving of debts, and granting the certificates. We have now come to the appointment of assignees. They are to be appointed by the major part, in value, of the creditors who have proved their debts. The debts may be proved any where, on oath or affirmation, and the party proving can vote by proxy, and, notwithstanding judicial investigation may be resorted to on every paper, much, if not all, of the evils of British practice will take place. Objects much at variance with the fair distribution of the estate among the creditors will often govern. Frauds will advance upon justice with steady pace, from this fruitful soil of temptation.

Fictitious debts will be proved, and the conspiracies appear that disgrace the English system. Assignees may be removed, and they are required to deliver over under a penalty of $5,000. The assignee has wasted the estate, together with his own; and where is your remedy? Executors and administrators are held to account. How can you make them account for what never came into their hands? The commissioners are to make assignments of the estate of the bankrupt. Will this operate an eviction of tenants in possession, or produce a surrender of personal property? Certainly not. Look at the scene of litigation which must occur, or what frauds must be confirmed. On information given, if the commissioners have good reason to believe or suspect that any of the property of the bankrupt is in the possession of any person, they shall have power to summon, (and ere they attach, too, by consequence;) yes, by such process or other means, as they think convenient, and examine them, &c.; and if they shall not declare the whole truth touching the subject-matter, then the commissioners may commit, &c. Tell me, now, are you serious in conferring such powers on those persons appointed by the President, whom he cannot know? Could they exercise these powers in this free community? If they could, I should doubt its fitness for freedom. We shall presently see how this power of commitment, for not declaring the whole truth, has worked in the country we are about to imitate. Perjury committed by others than the bankrupt is to be punished with a fine not exceeding $4,000, and imprisonment not exceeding two years, and by incapacity to give witness in any court of record. Every man is susceptible of imprisonment, but few, comparatively, of those who may be the subject of this punishment will be likely to have means of paying this fine. Is he to be discharged at the end of his term, whether payment or not can be made, or is he to be continued on a contempt? The bill is silent. How is he to be fed and clothed—where is the police of your prisons in this frightful bill, where so many crimes are to be engendered, most of which are to be punished with imprisonment? You have none. You have neither prison nor prison-keepers, and no provision is made for the treatment of the prisoner. The wealthy or fortunate culprit may have every comfort of life but liberty, while the indigent one must languish under hunger and nakedness. Such penal legislation as is here proposed is shocking to reflection. There is a vagueness of expression in the bill that seems to indicate the supposed existence of a common law jurisdiction, that, by judicial legislation, will fill up the chasms in the statute. I doubt very much if the judiciary will venture on so hardy an experiment in administering a penal statute. It follows, then, that no expectation is had of the penalties closing on delinquents. They are just put for show, and to eke out the system. I ask the gentleman from Delaware to say, if he thinks we have the power to say who shall be a competent witness in the courts of Delaware? Lands or goods assigned by the bankrupt to children or other persons, to defraud creditors, shall be assignable by the commissioners as effectually as if the bankrupt stood seized of them. This opens a wide avenue to litigation, and promises nothing to creditors.

We next come to the forty-two days within which surrender and disclosure is to be made of the bankrupt's person and affairs, which is to be prolonged to fifty more, on application to the judge, which, as in the English law, "will be quite a matter of course." And in this lapse of time, as there, a great amount of property will disappear. The oath requires he should purge himself of concealing any property, either before or after the commission issued, for his own benefit, or "except it had been really disposed of in the way of his dealings or trade, and family expenses—an item that will no doubt make a heavy draught on the estate." Such an oath would be about as effectual to obtain a fair disclosure as a sieve to lade water. Apparently, moral men might save a great deal under this oath. It is, in fact, offering temptation to perjury, and a sort of premium for it. If the bankrupt can only swear through successfully, his fortune is made, though he may have entered business but a little while before, without capital. There is little danger of the penalty; if it fails, it may be only twelve months, it cannot exceed ten years, confinement. Imprisonment may be mitigated by what money will purchase, and the pardoning power is ever ready to hear. But the chances are great in favor of escape and triumph, as we shall see in the sequel. There is to be a first dividend day, when the assignees shall be allowed to retain all sums of money they have expended prosecuting the commission, and all other just allowances on account of, or by reason or means of, being assignees. This does not promise much dividend. It promises nothing but business and fees to the officers and agents concerned. It is no wonder dividends so seldom occur! A second is to succeed in eighteen months after the issuing of the commission, which is to be final, unless any suit in law or equity be depending, or any of a variety of contingencies exist, some of which will, mostly where it is the interest of the assignees to keep their accounts unclosed. All the evils of delayed settlements, as under the British system, will result, doubtlessly. It is provided, certain liens shall not be impaired by the bankruptcy. I am not lawyer enough to say if mortgage creditors are to be paid a portion rate, as they are not in the exceptions. The assignees are to keep books, and have them for inspection of the creditors. Suppose they do not; no remedy is provided. The bill provides, a second bankruptcy shall not discharge contracts, and a third shall not even discharge the person of the debtor.

No provision, however, sir, seems to bar those who were discharged under the former law from being discharged under this; such persons can have two full benefits, and none others. The bill admits that those excluded may be tempted to become bankrupts in the hope of a discharge. But, if he be not found within the true intent and meaning of the act, he shall not be entitled to a certificate, nor, if granted, shall it avail him.

Gentlemen talk of the benefits the bill is to be to creditors. Its whole purpose is the release of the debtor from his contracts, and with invidious and unjust discriminations, and odious and unreasonable exclusions. After wading to the 35th section, we come to the last act of the drama—the certificate of bankruptcy that is to regenerate and disenfranchise the bankrupt from all his contracts. A district judge, sitting as grand chancellor, must issue this amulet, but the commissioners must certify the bankrupt has acted fairly, and two-thirds, in value and number, of his creditors above $50 must sign the certificate, and he must make oath he has surrendered his effects fairly. Any of his creditors may be heard before the judge, who may allow the certificate peremptorily, or have a summary hearing, and make a final decree. There is no jury here—it is all chancery. If a corporation be a creditor, and that only be wanting to make the two-thirds in number and value, it shall be considered as nothing. Now it may happen frequently that these proscribed corporations may be almost the sole creditor, but it shall have no control over the certificate. A bankrupt may owe $20,000, and $19,049 may be due to a corporation, and $51 to an individual; that individual signing will release the debtor from his contracts. This extraordinary feature is a new one—it was not in the law of 1800. The debtor is to be released at all events—that is the object of the bill. It is the first time, I venture to say, such a feature was ever proposed. It is departing from all the principles of bankrupt laws. They seem to have gone a great length of time before they were discharged at all. Till now, even in Britain they have not ventured to disregard the rights of more than one-quarter or one-fifth; but this is at one leap reversing all former ideas.

I think, sir, it is pretty clear, a certificate under these provisions will always issue. It is only for the bankrupt stoutly to swear through. He is to have family maintenance, three dollars a day for his attendance, and a dividend, too, if he be honest enough to surrender his property. But a certificate and maintenance are secured alike to honest and dishonest. If a bankrupt does not discover fraudulent demands, he loses his dividend and his certificate. This only points out where frauds will occur—it offers no preventive. A jailer is to forfeit $3,000 if he suffers a bankrupt committed on the commissioner's warrant to escape; a forfeiture of $3,000 for a jailer! It might just as well have been a million. The assignees are to sell at auction, free of any tax. I doubt the wisdom of hazarding this provision. I believe it would be found difficult to resist a State law, that should levy a tax on such auctions. The petitioning creditor is to give bond to pay the costs and charges of the commission. This would be very convenient in a concerted commission; if the commissioners get their fees, we shall not see them care much if there be a dividend or not. The poor man who may not have enough to pay the costs, may lie in jail till the laws of insolvency release him. He is not worthy of the boon of a certificate of bankruptcy, though he may have been an eminent and honest merchant. The creditors are to direct the deposit of the moneys in some bank; but if the assignees do not choose to comply, there is an end to it. By the 59th section the State insolvent laws are reserved, and any person imprisoned remaining therein one month, and not prosecuted as a bankrupt, is to be relievable under these laws. Taking all these provisions into view, and what must be the inevitable conclusion as to their effect? A very small class of our insolvent citizens can have the benefit of a certificate. Those who are within its purview are the class whose insolvency has very much been produced by extravagance and desperate adventure; among whom the strongest temptation to fraud will exist. An honest merchant, of whatever extent of business, and however a victim of misfortune not to have been foreseen, if he has surrendered his all, and no petitioning creditor can expect reimbursement of costs and charges of the commission, is without the scope of the bill's benevolence; is turned over to the State insolvent laws—to withering despair; while he who risked nothing, having nothing, who has failed full-handed, and withholds from his creditors, may, by a concerted commission, obtain a release almost to a certainty. This law is to close immediately. Do you not believe those who are anxious for its benefit are prepared to realize it?

The Bankrupt Bill.

SENATE.

Yes, sir; we must know little of human nature if we do not believe it; and they will be sought by all the means human experience has matured in England, or by the former law here, of which this is substantially a copy, so far as relates to temptations to frauds and perjuries. The old maxim of the merchant was, that, if he became opulent by a life devoted to business, it was the success that founded his wishes. But, in later times, it was accounted nothing unless four or five years' business did not realize a splendid fortune, and in the mean time allow the indulgence in splendid extravagance. No doubt there will always be, among insolvent trading men, many of merit; but the mass of those whom this bill compassionates and seeks to relieve, are very far from being of the class of insolvents most to be pitied and most worthy of relief. The great defect of all bankrupt laws, and of this in particular, is, that it does not discriminate between the innocent and blamable insolvent. They are equally entitled to relief, on a surrender of their property; equally entitled to daily pay, family maintenance, &c.; though the one by misfortune may have lost fairly and honorably a solid fortune, and the other never had owned a solid dollar. No law can be safe or useful that consolidates such extremes, and extends equal benefit to men of so very different aspects of character. Bankruptcy will hardly cure the rash and desperate adventurer. He has the impulse from nature, and habit has confirmed it on him. Certify him and make him a new man, and we shall soon see the meteor reappear in the precincts of trade.

In the 63d section, a chancery jurisdiction is gotten up, that is to extend to all cases arising under bankrupt laws. It is not easy to conceive the consequences that are thence to flow. This, too, is the English system, only there there is a single head, but here we are to get up a hydra, with as many heads as there are circuit and district judges; every one being a tribunal of the last resort. So monstrous an innovation on all the just principles of jurisprudence has, I believe, never been adventured upon by any the most despotic Governments. Every pretence will justify a chancery suit.

The evil passions will be ever ready to seize this mean of gratification, and professional ingenuity will be taxed to spread the evil. Chancery is chancery every where. It is one of those modes of administering distributive justice not compatible with a free country. Bills can be filed in the scheme here presented, where no decision is sought or wished. He who may be thus assailed will be happy if he lives long enough to get clear of his defence. The decree is to be according to equity and good conscience, and shall be conclusive, and forced by attachment or other process in the discretion of the judge—"the law of tyrants." You may call him who has power such as this a judge, but he is in essence a tyrant, and you can have no security against his abusing his powers but public opinion, a poor, though the only check upon tyrants. You will have by this bill at once thirty independent and uncontrolled chancellors, holding their office by permanent tenure, of every degree of intellect and professional capacity, who cannot always be known when appointed, but whom you must take for better or worse, in sickness or in health, through good and evil report. From such a system, what can we expect but the fruits of a tyranny erected by folly?

It was not, till within a few days, that I determined to examine this bill, and the principles on which it is founded. It was a subject I was not (as I before noted) conversant with. I went into your library to search for information. I found plenty of law, but I could find nothing in the history of the administration of it. I was led to inquire of my experienced friend from North Carolina, (Mr. MACON,) upon what ground the former had been repealed. He referred me to the chairman of the Committee of Commerce of the House of Representatives, (Mr. NEWTON,) who had been active in proposing the repeal. He very kindly informed me that law had, in three years, produced universal disgust, from the enormous evils it had originated. He obligingly added, I can put into your hands the minutes of evidence taken before a committee of the British House of Commons, on the subject of their bankrupt laws, reported in the year 1818. I found, subsequently, the document had been in the hands of my friend from South Carolina, (Mr. SMITH,) and his notices have facilitated my examination of it much. At one time I resigned the task into his hands I am now executing, but a multiplicity of engagements has induced him to refer it back to me. I have thus lost some time, and have not been able to speak in a manner so well digested as I wished. I shall recur to the minutes of evidence; they are derived from commissioners of bankruptcy of the best standing, solicitors, members of Parliament, and men in business. I shall not read the extracts in a digested order. They go directly to illustrate and sustain the observations I have made generally. They prove, conclusively, that, after a trial of three centuries, in England, and frequent statutory modifications, the system has at last resulted in multiplying crimes and most extensive evils. In fine, that it has failed. Mr. Montague, a commissioner, says: "The advantages of being solicitor are almost obvious; all the litigation with which the estate may be properly or improperly burdened—litigation not checked by the fear of expense to the individual on whose behalf the process is instituted, and not subjected to any control, except by the assignee, with whom there may be such an understanding as not to render investigation expedient." "Assignees seek the appointment to conceal transactions which others might detect, as a case of usury. I once knew a case where a bankrupt reluctantly disclosed an usurious transaction, conscious of the control of the creditor, as assignee, without success, as the delinquent would not sign the certificate, and of course he was not a competent witness. A creditor who has obtained a preference in payment is often anxious to become an assignee, to prevent a disclosure. Assignees often offer themselves to favor the bankrupt in concerted commissions.

Men in the same trade will offer to learn who were the bankrupt's customers. Another motive to become assignee is, to purchase the bankrupt's estate in collusion with him. Another is to retain the unclaimed dividends or undivided residue. The last motive which induces a wish to be assignee, is to obtain dominion over the bankrupt's property, which may result in entire embezzlement. With regard to the proof of accommodation bills, I believe them to exist to a very considerable and alarming extent. I believe conclusive proof of this might be obtained from examining what creditors have proved debts, under different commissions. In a case before the 10th list of commissioners, I was counsel against the proof of certain debts; almost all of them were brought forward by persons who were or had been bankrupts. They were defeated, and the parties, as is usual in such cases, compromised, and I heard no more of it. In 1809 a bankrupt, for whom I was retained in counsel, told me that he could obtain the signature of any number of persons to his certificate; that nothing was more easy than to obtain the proof of fictitious debts, and that there were persons who lived by proving debts and signing certificates. There are many men in the city of London who obtain capital for extensive business out of the trust of assignee. When the creditors become very clamorous, and they have been summoned two or three times before the commissioners, at the end of two years, or perhaps longer, they will declare a first dividend, taking care to keep a considerable sum on hand, and this they will do by entering claims against the estate, to be proved at the next dividend, and reserve the amount of such claims in hand at the first dividend. After a lapse of another two or three years, they will declare a second dividend. The creditors being thus wearied out, a third or final dividend is seldom obtained of assignees of this description. Sir, says a correspondent to me, could you see those numerous cases of malversation, misapplication, and shameful neglect of assignees, that perpetually meet the eye of the solicitor, you would be satisfied, with me, they are a great cause of bankruptcy itself. The practice has now got to such a pitch, that I verily believe barely one assignee in a dozen, fairly, industriously, and honestly, performs his duty. After a tedious detail of abuses, which your patience will not allow me to read, Mr. Montague proposes, as a remedy, "that there should be an Accountant General, charged with the disposing of the effects, collecting the debts, and making dividends pertaining to all bankruptcies." The bill before us goes upon the old British system of assignees. It is in vain gentlemen hope to escape these abuses. Are Americans less acute than Britons; or have they shown less address in every branch of trade? These abuses grow out of the spirit of trade; they intrinsically belong to it, and no legislation can avoid the evils if you adopt a bankrupt system. Again, Mr. Montague says: "In forty thousand bankruptcies, I doubt whether there have been ten prosecutions. I believe there have only been three executions, and yet fraudulent bankrupts and concealments of property are proverbial; are so common as to be supposed almost to have lost the nature of crime."

Mr. Montague proposes "to assist prosecuting creditors with funds out of the bankrupt's estate." This shows that it is not the severity of the punishment only that discourages prosecutions, but the difficulty of conviction, trouble and expense, which operate alike under milder or severer punishments. Your bill, like the British system, supposes that an act of bankruptcy shall be done with intent to defraud or delay a creditor; therefore, an act to benefit him cannot be an act to defraud or delay him. This, says Mr. Montague, "is the whole foundation of concerted commissions." The bill will, I have no doubt, produce a plentiful harvest of the abuses accompanying them, and growing out of them. The evidence proceeds: "The creditor sustains by the bankrupt a loss of property, his feelings are also wounded by the improper conduct of one in whom he confided. He ought, therefore, to have control over the certificate. It is impossible he should explain to any tribunal the nature of the injury he may have sustained by abuse of his confidence. I propose three-fifths in number and value of the creditors should control the certificate." In the bill before us the creditor may be heard, but the judge has power to give the certificate peremptorily, and without appeal from his decision. Ought such a power to release any man from the obligation of contracts, to be rested any where? The bill proposes two-thirds of the creditors, but it seems designed to dispense with them altogether.

Mr. Montague was asked, "Do you not think it extremely common for the most undeserving bankrupts to obtain their certificates? I do believe that it is most common for the most undeserving bankrupts to obtain their certificates by fraudulent and improper means, to the great injury of the good creditor, and to the great injury of public justice; and I do think that it frequently happens that dishonest bankrupts, from having recourse to means from which honesty would recoil, have greater facility in obtaining their certificates than honest men possess." Mr. Montague, from the 6th volume of Vesey's Reports, read the following declaration of the Lord Chancellor: "He expressed his strong indignation at the frauds committed under cover of the bankrupt laws. The abuses of it are a disgrace to the country. It would be better to repeal at once all the statutes than to suffer them to be applied to such purposes. There is no mercy to the estate; nothing is less thought of than the commission. As they are frequently conducted in the country, they are little more than a stock in trade for the commissioners, the assignees, and the solicitor. Instead of solicitors attending to their duties as ministers of the court, for they are so, commissions of bankruptcy are treated as matter of traffic. A taking up the commission, B and C acting as commissioners. They are considered as stock in trade, and calculations are made how many commissions can be brought into the partnership. Unless the court holds a strong hand over a bankruptcy, particularly as administered in the country, it is itself accessory to as great a nuisance as any known in the land, and known too to pass under the forms of its laws." This opinion expressed in 1809, Mr. Montague "conceives to have been greatly strengthened by cases which have arisen since." The Chancellor, in one case, concludes his judgment thus: "It comes round to this, whether in a case where one partner is petitioning creditor, another partner the acting commission, another partner the solicitor to the commission, and the remaining partner the sole assignee, the commission can be permitted to stand." It is the Chancellor speaks. Is this a system we ought to copy? In the evidence of Mr. Vandercorn, a solicitor, he was asked, "If in his experience the greater number of the acts of bankruptcy had not been concerted? Answer. I think they have, the greatest part of them. Do you not think the majority of commissions are issued with the concurrence, and at the request of the bankrupt? I think they are." He was asked, "Is it not in the power of an insolvent to delay his bankruptcy, and in the interim misapply property in payment of favored creditors? It certainly is. Have you not known, in the course of your professional experience, a great many dishonorable and worthless bankrupts obtain their certificates? I certainly have. I may venture to say, I have hardly known an unfortunate man who was altogether deprived of his certificate, or a dishonest one that did not find the means of procuring it." "The man goes with the warrant of seizure," says Mr. Vandercorn; "he is placed below stairs, and knows nothing of what is going on above. This I believe to be the time when the greatest speculation prevails. Relations and friends attend for condolence. I believe most of them take something away. They live upon the house and the produce so long as they are permitted." Mr. Lavie, a solicitor, on evidence, says: "The business of bankruptcy is not sought for eagerly by solicitors of eminence and character. As the bankrupt laws are at present managed, they afford advantage to no one except the bankrupt. If solicitors do their duty, they get neither credit nor profit. With regard to creditors, any means short of bankruptcy in honest cases is preferable, and I consider the criterion of a person subject to the bankrupt laws, being desirous of acting fairly by his creditors, is, whether he seeks a bankruptcy, or is desirous to avoid it. Those desirous of making up their affairs without a bankruptcy, are certainly to be commended; and those anxious to go into the Gazette evidently have in view their own relief, not the interests of their creditors. Upon all occasions I have considered it for the interest of my employers, whether bankrupts or creditors, to endeavor, in the first instance, by every possible means, to prevent a commission from issuing. The settlement of the affairs of insolvents in my office have been very numerous. Compositions and other modes of arrangements have very much increased. The increase of bankruptcies being, in my opinion, solely of petty traders, so long as the bankrupt laws continue as they are now, any thing, as I have said before, short of bankruptcy, is desirable." Again, Mr. Lavie answers: "If the solicitor, assignee, and the bankrupt, should be in collusion together, proving debts by oath, where the creditor does not appear, would afford facility for frauds." This avenue is left entirely open in the bill. Sir Samuel Romilly states, in his evidence, "There is an offence often committed under the bankrupt laws, more serious than not surrendering, or concealing property, for which there is appointed a much slighter punishment, to wit: the procuring of a commission, in order, by means of false and fictitious debts proved under it, to obtain a relief from real debts. This has become very common. This fraud can only be perpetrated, by numerous, repeated, and flagrant perjuries. This is an intrinsic vice in the system, not curable. When you tempt men by your legislation to commit crimes, your penalties avail nothing. The greatest moral evils must flow from any law which offers the hope of a release from debts to a man who is not able or willing to pay."

Mr. Waithman, a man of great experience in trade, says: "The great defect in the system has arisen from the want of discrimination between the honest and dishonest debtors. They are on precisely the same footing. I seldom find a bankrupt fails to get his certificate. I have witnessed property passing away before the eyes of the creditor, and he has not been able to lay his hands on it. I pursued a bankrupt, and had above twenty meetings; fictitious debts to a large amount were proved. The property all disappeared in a moment. A vast number of bills were fabricated; they chose assignees, and carried all before them. I had twenty meetings at my own expense; he swore himself out of one thing into another; I at last obtained consent for his commitment; some doubts as to form deferred it until next day, and the man ran away, and there was end to it." "I have observed, there is hardly ever a man, however atrocious his conduct, who cannot contrive to get his certificate, and go into business again. I have observed, nine times out of ten, the commission is worked for the benefit of the bankrupt, not the creditors." "Do you not, it was asked, think the bankrupt law, as it now exists in this country, is a scandal and disgrace to it? I have long considered it so; and that it has induced much dishonesty. Major Simple said to a Bow-street officer, why I have been a fool all my lifetime. I have not known how to go to work; I have been running the risk of my life for a trifling thing; but, if I were to begin again, I would open a shop as a trader, become a bankrupt, and make my fortune at once." Mr. Cullen, a commissioner: "The bankrupt law was introduced to prevent and punish frauds of debtors, and distribute their property equally among their creditors; but it has not succeeded. However wise at first, and modified since, it effects neither of these objects, the property is not forthcoming, or it is wasted. The same frauds still exist, neither diminished nor punished; and a new class has sprung up, engendered by the very proceedings instituted to prevent them, so that the prominent evil of the present day appears to be the bankrupt law itself. Without it, individual creditors would have the ordinary chance, by better luck, or greater diligence to recover their particular debts. But, the bankrupt law, while it defeats individual right, produces the loss of all under the precious forms of proceeding at the common expense for the common benefit. I am convinced that a majority of commissions that issue, may be considered as a sort of conspiracies between the debtor, and one or more of his creditors, to plunder the rest. Concerted commissions must arise out of this law from the nature of its provisions. I would suggest whether the certificate should discharge the future property, except the estate paid 75 per cent.?" In the evidence of Mr. Grote, a banker, it is stated: "That the improvidence of the bankrupt; the false statement he gives in at the third examination; the want of making the most of his effects; (the account of which he gives in on his third examination.) The assignees seldom pay any dividend whatever. I applied within the last six months for dividend in three instances. In the first £30,000 were proved to exist two years after the commission issued. The assignee had collected barely £200, which was absorbed in expenses. In a second case I got seven farthings in the pound; and in the third, a dividend of nine pence. I have perfectly made up my mind that I would rather take an offer of two shillings and six pence in the pound than my chance for a dividend if it went to the Gazette. I suggest that no bankrupt should have his certificate unless he paid a dividend." Mr. Montague says: "Bankrupts are induced to conceal their property in order to bribe their creditors; they buy goods upon credit, after the last act of bankruptcy, in order, either to make partial payments to hostile creditors, or to fail full handed; and if the honesty of the bankrupt renders him unable to bribe his creditors, they have another resource, by obtaining security from him, or by extorting from the compassion of his friends, what they cannot procure from his poverty.

Mr. Lockhart, a member of the committee, stated: "that, in almost every commission in which he had been named, he found the bankrupt had acted with great injustice towards his creditors, generally with dishonesty and fraud, and always with imprudence and carelessness of the wreck of his substance, which is not his, but theirs. The cause is found in the facility with which the bankrupt goes through his commission. It is proved from the situation he is generally found in after his last examination, the appearance he makes, and the connexions he renews. The want of a due investigation to discriminate between innocent insolvents and fraudulent ones appears to be a radical defect of our law. It is difficult at present to prevent the proof of unfounded claims, and which are generally attempted to be proved with a view to the choice of assignees, and the granting of the certificate. There are laws now in force to prevent these practices, but they are of little effect; and the bankrupt, who might detect and expose them, is the party most interested in concealment and silence. The committee have already abundant evidence of those criminal combinations and perjuries, and of the fictitious bills of exchange which are drawn and circulated in order to give them effect."

I shall forbear further remark; neither your patience nor my own strength allow me to proceed. I look for the argument to be supported by friends much better qualified than I am to do it justice.

When Mr. ROBERTS concluded, Mr. BARBOUR moved that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, it was agreed to take this question by yeas and nays.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 7.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating that the measures which have been authorized by the board subsequent to the report of the 5th of February, 1820, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to that board, also communicated as part of the report of said Commissioners; and the report was read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, presented the memorial of the General Assembly of that State, praying that the right of pre-emption may be granted to certain settlers on the public lands within said State; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented the petition of Joseph G. Roberts, of that State, and late a surgeon in the Navy, praying to be allowed a share of certain prize money; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, obtained leave to bring in a bill concerning the process of execution issuing from the sixth circuit court of the United States, for the district of Georgia; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Rosalie P. Deslonde," and the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Pierre Dennis De La Ronde," reported them severally without amendment.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings," was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday to appoint a joint committee to ascertain and report a mode of examining the votes of President and Vice President, and of notifying the persons elected of their election, and agreed thereto; and Messrs. BARBOUR and MACON were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of complying with the request of the Choctaw Indians to grant tracts of land to certain individuals, and agreed thereto.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, instructing the Committee of Claims to inquire into the expediency of allowing the claim of David Cooper, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of George Jackson, and it was postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance on the petition of John Lowden; and, on motion by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, it was laid on the table.

RELIEF TO LAND PURCHASERS.

The Senate proceeded to consider again the bill for the relief of purchasers of public lands; and

Mr. KING, of New York, moved further to amend the same by substituting for a part of the bill the following new sections:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the interest which shall have accrued before the — day of —, upon any debt of the United States, for public land, shall be, and the same is hereby, remitted and discharged.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That on all debts to the United States, which may have arisen from the purchase of public land, at a price less than three dollars the acre, a discount at the rate of twenty-five per cent. shall be allowed and made; and that on all such debts, which may have arisen from the purchase of public land at or above three dollars the acre, a discount, at the rate of thirty-three and one-third per cent., shall be allowed and made; and the persons indebted to the United States, as aforesaid, shall be divided into three classes: the first class to include all such persons as shall have paid to the United States only one-fourth part of the original price of the land by them respectively purchased or held; the second class to include all such persons as shall have paid to the United States only one-half part of such original price; and the third class to include all such persons as shall have paid to the United States three-fourth parts of such original price; and the debts of the persons included in the first class shall be paid in eight equal annual instalments; the debts of the persons included in the second class shall be paid in six equal annual instalments; and the debts of the persons included in the third class shall be paid in four equal annual instalments; the first of which instalments, in each of the classes aforesaid, shall be paid on the — day of —, and the whole of the debt aforesaid shall bear an annual interest at the rate of six per cent: Provided, always, That the same shall be remitted upon each and every of the instalments aforesaid, which shall be punctually paid when the same shall become payable as aforesaid.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That for failure to pay the several debts aforesaid, in manner aforesaid, and for the term of three months after the day appointed for the payment of the last instalment thereof, in each of the classes aforesaid, the land so purchased, or held by the respective persons indebted to the United States as aforesaid, shall, ipso facto, become forfeited and revert to the United States.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That no person shall be deemed to be included within, or entitled to the benefit of, any of the provisions of this act, who shall not, on or before the — day of —, sign, and file in the office of the register of the land office of the district where the land was purchased, a declaration in writing, expressing his consent to the same.

And then, on motion of Mr. KING, of New York, the bill and amendments were recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. BARBOUR delivered his sentiments in opposition to the bill.

Mr. OTIS said, that, in rising to address the Senate upon the subject of a bankrupt act, he felt, equally with the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) the difficulty of obtaining the attention of those who were called to decide upon the question: That gentleman, however, had succeeded in giving to the inquiry an interest which he could not aspire to excite. The subject had grown familiar to the public and to the Legislature. It was dry in its nature and voluminous, and to appearance complicated in its details. In the observations which it was his present intention to offer, he should avoid details and confine himself to an explanation of some general and leading principles, and even in performing this duty he feared he might fail to engage the attention of the Senate. Yet he was firmly persuaded that the claim of those interested in the result of the question, was exceeded in importance by none but those subjects, a decision upon which was at all times indispensable to the support of Government. With that exception, he insisted they were of equal rank with any other question that could be agitated; whether considered in reference to the magnitude of the interested party, the long standing of their pretensions, the extent of the benefit to be derived from the relief contemplated, the happiness and comfort which would attend success, and on the chagrin and misery that awaited a failure of the measure. A calamity affecting specially one class of the community, spread over the whole extent of the nation, sometimes made less impression on the mind, than an evil, which, though involving a much less considerable number of individuals, was felt by the whole society of a particular place—and though every wind which blows from the various quarters of the Union, comes laden with the sighs of the unfortunate insolvent, and the groans of the imprisoned debtor, as well as with the regrets of his creditor, yet are they disregarded, and die upon the ear before they reach the heart.

If, said he, the fire which last night broke out in the city had extended its desolation far and wide—if the torch of the incendiary had been applied in various quarters to the habitations, and thousands of tenants had been turned houseless into the streets—or if the Great Disposer of events had permitted the baleful pestilence in the course of the past season to sweep over its population; and under these circumstances, the survivors of these disasters this morning filled your galleries and lobbies with their complaints and petitions for assistance; with what alacrity would you proceed to administer whatever relief could be had at your hands, possessing as you do exclusive jurisdiction in this District! Yet those who are now before you with petitions for your humane aid, are sufficiently numerous, if collected together, to form a population very many times exceeding that of this city—their accumulated wretchedness would be found to exceed that of the visitations just supposed, and they are equally the subjects of your exclusive guardianship under the Constitution of the United States.

The time, he said, had now arrived in which the parties interested in the passing of a bankrupt act, were entitled not merely to request it as a favor, but with all due respect to demand it as a right. It might be affirmed as a universal proposition, that the acceptance of a trust imposed upon the trustee an obligation to discharge its duties. A sound discretion as to the time and mode of performing such duties were certainly of course implied, but the trustee cannot object to the nature of his trust. Now the objections of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) go to the very essence of the trust itself. His hostility is to a bankrupt act at all times and in all places, and to such objections thus openly avowed, the true answer is, they come too late. You have accepted the trust, and are bound by the Constitution. But the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROBERTS) resorts to the old system of opposition to the measure, and while he objects to the details of the bill, in other words to the mode of executing the trust, he contends still for the discretionary power of Congress in the selection of the proper time. There is, however, no real difference between objections to the nature of the trust, and such objections to the time and mode of execution, as show that he who makes them will never be reconciled to any time or any mode. Will he pledge himself to any fixed time or to any substitute for the proposed plan? If he will not, he deceives himself, (for it is not to be said that he is insincere to others) in assailing the details of the bill, when his enmity applies to its principle; and in objecting to the exercise of a discretion at this time, which he in his conscience wishes and means should be forever suspended. Thus, the two honorable gentlemen are agreed in their object, and arrive by different routes to the same issue. It is the bankrupt system, under all its aspects, and in every imaginable form, to which they are opposed. It is to the nature of the trust—to the execution of a power conferred by the Constitution, for the benefit of a great class of the citizens of the Union, whose trustees you are. This trust, previously to the adoption of the Federal Government, was vested in the separate States. It was a necessary and inseparable incident of State authority claiming to be sovereign. It is a power indispensable to the exigencies of a commercial people. It was always exercised, permanently or occasionally, by the Legislatures or subordinate magistrates, by standing or by special laws in the separate States. Now it can be no longer enforced to any useful end by the State jurisdiction—it has been transferred to Congress as trustees for all persons, whether creditor or debtor, who have or may have an interest in such a system. The Supreme Tribunal of the Union has decided that the States can make no laws discharging an insolvent person from the demands of his creditors. Of consequence, Congress is bound to execute this trust at some time, and in some mode; otherwise the States which have surrendered that power are caught in a snare and disqualified from relieving the distress of their own citizens—while vast numbers of unfortunate persons are converted into outlaws and deprived of the benefits and protection afforded to the citizen by all civilized communities. This high obligation to execute a trust for the use of all who have the beneficiary interest is a fundamental of all public as well as of all municipal law. Neither the executive or judiciary departments can dispense with the performance of their several duties, constantly and indefinitely, under the pretext of discretion in regard to time and means.

Nor can the right of Congress to withhold relief from the urgent claims of a great portion of their constituents be inferred from their power. It was for the purpose of giving activity and energy to the powers vested in the General Government that the Constitution was framed, and not to the end that such as could not be efficaciously employed by the separate States, but were nevertheless of vital importance, should be thrown into a general reservoir of national authority, and therein be permitted to remain entirely stagnant. It was not, he repeated, his intention, on the present occasion, to go into an investigation of the special provisions of the bill upon the table. Should this be thought requisite, after the attention of Congress had been so frequently called to that examination, he doubted not it would be undertaken and performed by others to the perfect satisfaction of the Senate. He professed that his object would be merely to illustrate, by general remarks, the points to which he had adverted, namely, the condition and numbers of the applicants for relief—the duty of Congress to provide for it, and to obviate some of the principal objections now urged by the opponents of the measure. Let us first, then, bestow a cursory consideration upon the circumstances, condition, and numbers of those who are interested in the fate of this question.

The debtors may, for this purpose, be divided into three classes. First, persons in actual confinement for debt. These are either such as, in a state of extreme and unqualified pauperism, drag out their wretched existence in the charnel-houses of living misery, waiting for the advantage, so called, of State insolvent laws; or others who are one degree removed from the immediate dangers of hunger and nakedness, by having concealed some paltry remnant of the wreck of their little fortunes, preferring the duration of bolts and bars to the iron grasp of the laws which authorize the seizure of the last trifle for the benefit of the first plaintiff.

The next description of persons consists of those to whom the calculating or relenting mercy of their creditors has spared the last bitter portion of actual imprisonment, but who are stripped nearly or entirely of their all, and turned out naked upon the world. This class is more numerous than the other, includes a greater mass of misery, and calls upon your humanity and your policy in a still louder tone for commiseration and relief.

Leaving, then, for the present, all considerations of humanity, surely it is not a matter of light moment, that this numerous body of individuals are, in their present circumstances, disqualified for the performance of the most important duties of the man and the citizen. Of what value is a distressed and harassed insolvent debtor to his country? His mind is distracted, his energies are paralyzed, his heart is broken. He feels as if all his relations to society were extinguished. His sensibility to the happiness or misery, to the honor or wrongs of his country, are merged in the agony of his own wretchedness. Selfishness is the offspring of a sense of desolation which tells him he has no friends. He goes forth in the morning under the languid impulse of some vague and undefinable hope; and wanders through the streets busy with occupations in which he has no share, in quest of he knows not what. He encounters the frown of his offended creditor, the "proud man's contumely," the averted countenance of the friend of happier days. At night he returns to a habitation of which he is tenant by sufferance from hour to hour. He meets the companion of his sorrows and the partner of his fate, without any tidings of comfort even in prospect. His children turn towards him with the instinct of the nestling, for the food which he has not brought. To hide the anguish of his soul, he flies to the bed which the pity of his creditor may have left to him, but not to repose. Or if perchance tired nature yields for a time to the conflict with suffering, and the tear which blisters on his cheek permits him to doze, instead of peaceful visions, poverty and famine, "in execrable shape," disturb his dreams, and the sad reality of his waking hours is exchanged for the aggravated torments of his doubtful slumbers. This is an epitome of the days of thousands—too often varied by recourse to the miserable comforts which idleness and despair are so apt to embrace. Here, then, are fathers and heads of families! What, in this state, is to be the destiny and utility of their children? What the effect upon the public morals, wealth, and prosperity of the nation? Entire generations, constantly multiplying, are to be brought up in pauperism and idleness, destitute of education, untaught in civil duties, and insensible to the love of country.

There was still a third class of debtors, whose case would be reached by this bill. Those who, having actually become insolvent, or, being in failing circumstances, had concealed or otherwise secured property, either for themselves alone, or for favored creditors. In this class are comprehended, not merely those who have taken this step in a spirit of fraud, but great numbers who would willingly surrender their effects under a bankrupt system, but who, for want of it, make their consciences conform to their exigency, and live at the expense of their creditors upon a fund which is daily melting away.

Now, sir, as the wives and children of these unfortunate persons are manifestly parties in interest to the provisions of the bill not less than themselves, you have before you a mass of distressed persons seeking for relief, which, whatever difference of opinion may prevail respecting their aggregate number, could not be regarded with indifference if they alone were the petitioners for the act. But they are far enough from being destitute of auxiliaries who have a different, but still a most valuable interest, in its success. The creditor class of the whole nation may fairly be regarded as uniting in the support of this bill. Not only had numerous petitions, some from meetings of merchants, and others signed by individuals, been preferred to Congress, but expressions of public sentiment in favor of it were reiterated from all quarters of the Union, with one accord, through all ordinary vehicles of intelligence and opinion, in newspapers, and pamphlets, and circular letters. Never did a more general and longing expectation of a measure prevail. This was not counteracted, so far as he could learn, by any meeting, remonstrance, or opposition, whatsoever, except in one instance by a portion of his constituents—of whom, some had informed him subsequently to the signature of their remonstrance, that they had changed their opinion and been converted to a belief of the necessity of the act.

Taking, then, in connexion this great union of men and interest in favor of the measure, he was warranted in asserting that no application could be made to Congress more entitled to attention. Some uncertainty attended every estimate of their numbers. He had been assured that, on a former occasion, his computation was quite short of the sum total. From his best means of information, he now was induced to think that the number of insolvent debtors and their families in the United States, (of appalling magnitude in itself,) when added to that of their creditors, amounted to at least half a million of persons. After every allowance for erroneous data, it was doubtless very great—a number, beyond all controversy, equal to the population of several States in the Union, reckoned collectively. If the honorable gentleman from Alabama, (Mr. KING,) who was on his right, and the other honorable gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. EATON,) on his left, were authorized to represent any particular grievance bearing down to the dust the entire population of their respective States, which it was competent to Congress to redress; with what importunate eloquence should we hear from them, until redress was obtained! Yet the population represented by the friends of the bill interested in its fate, greatly exceeded that of both those States; and, strictly speaking, had a more legitimate claim on the national Government for relief, than any State could ever set up, inasmuch as a universal calamity always outweighs a local grievance. Then, sir, wherefore shall not these persons be gratified in a reasonable request? What requisite is wanting to their claim? They combine numbers, wealth, misfortune, interest in the country, political rights, and a special right to a Constitutional protection, intended expressly for their circumstances and condition. So far as the debtors are concerned, their happiness or misery is involved.

With a wise Government the happiness of the citizens will always be regarded as its principal aim. The happiness of each class constitutes the welfare of all. The "salus populi," which is the "suprema lex," means not merely the safety of the people, but their felicity, for the promotion of which, only, is their safety of any value. You may have safety, and glory, and splendor, and what is commonly, though falsely, called national prosperity, in monarchies, and under despotic forms. But happiness and comfort belong to, or ought to emanate from, the depositories of a mild, paternal, popular authority, which feels the sympathies, consults the interests, listens to the petitions, and obviates the complaints, of all the various classes of the people. Some great defect of wisdom or attention, or of enlarged and liberal views, is always to be suspected in a Republic where any one great portion or interest in society is permitted to remain for years together in a state of discontent and misery, without a single public measure adopted for its relief.

Having thus stated his views of the number and pretensions of those for whose benefit, as creditors and debtors, the bill was intended, he said, he would offer a few remarks explanatory of the true intent of the Constitution, to which he had already alluded. He had, indeed, indulged a hope that the Senate had come to the consideration of one public bill, which might proceed without the embarrassment of Constitutional difficulties. But the objections of honorable gentlemen, if they do not proceed to the whole extent of a denial of the power of Congress to legislate upon the affair of bankruptcy, go far enough to render the power nugatory, and to show that it ought to remain a dead letter. Yet it is worthy of observation, that, in that number of the Federalist which treats of the Constitutional provisions concerning bankruptcy, (and which in the edition possessed by him was ascribed to Mr. Madison,) the fitness of vesting the whole power of making laws regulating that subject, is considered as so palpable and almost self-evident, that, for that express reason, the writer forbears to illustrate and maintain it by any arguments, resting its propriety upon the obvious dictates of common sense, and leaving it to the understanding of his readers. By the light of this common sense it will be easy to discern the reason, and, indeed, the necessity, of reposing this power in the General Government, as contracts are governed by the laws of the place or State where they are made. The tribunals either of the State or of the United States are competent to do complete justice to a creditor against a debtor, while he continues to be solvent. Each creditor acts for himself, and if, by any legal process, he can obtain payment of his own demand when due, he has no further concern in the funds of his debtor, nor in any arrangements or negotiations between him and other creditors. But the relations of the creditor of the bankrupt towards him, and among each other, are entirely changed by his insolvency. He becomes by the very act, conformably to the principles of natural justice, a trustee of a common fund for the use of all his creditors, in a just proportion to their demands. They are in equity, and should be in law, converted into one party, and compelled to submit to an average loss, and to be precluded from all priorities and preferences in favor of one or more of their number. When they have become entirely possessed of such fund, it is still in furtherance of the same just and equitable principles that they should be restrained from further legal process, in every part of the nation, against the person or future earnings of the bankrupt. His creditors, however, may be citizens of different States. He may have occasion to go, or to place his future earnings beyond the limits of his own State. If any of his debtors, residing in another State, should become bankrupt, it is just that he should be entitled to the same measure of assets which his creditors in such other State will be empowered to obtain from him. There is then no one State whose courts or laws could, by any possibility, make adjudications, or enforce regulations, embracing these objects and innumerable collateral circumstances and requisites attending a system of bankruptcy. This impossibility was realized by the framers of the Constitution. They knew that bankruptcy was incident to commerce at all times and in all places. They perceived that an uniform system only would be capable of securing equal and impartial justice to all the citizens, in every part of the nation, and of controlling the monstrous extravagancies and collisions of the State insolvent laws, which they knew were not to be endured among the citizens of the same nation. Pursuant to these convictions, they clothed Congress with the entire power; and it is quite worthy of observation, that, while in all cases of controversy between citizens of the same State, (unless bankruptcy has happened,) the jurisdiction is left exclusively in the State courts, yet, in the event of bankruptcy, and in that event alone, an act of Congress regulating that subject would operate directly upon all controversies to which the bankrupt might be a party, (no matter with whom,) and consequently draw them into the sphere of the national judiciary. Well then might the author of the Federalist, just now cited, rely upon the full and unequivocal concession of this power to Congress, and assume for it a character of fitness and expediency which required the support of no commentary whatever. And why, sir, should this most urgent and necessary measure be delayed—a measure which forms a distinguished feature in the code of every civilized commercial nation? If the time has not arrived for the experiment, in what disastrous juncture shall it be expected? In what country, and at what period, has commerce been exposed to the tremendous, sudden, and total vicissitudes which it has undergone in our own nation, and in our own time? When was ever known a spirit of enterprise so ardent, impelled by such prospects, rewarded by such success, tempted to such dangers, and suddenly checked by a reaction so overwhelming and unexpected? The whole world of commerce is shaken to its centre. And with us all the elements and means of commerce are disturbed and impaired. In many parts of the country an unsound currency has supplanted a valuable medium, and the depreciation of capital in land, produce, ships, and merchandise, is universal. No reliance can be placed on the foreign or domestic market, and the want of confidence has caused the precious metals to be withdrawn from circulation, and to be hoarded in the coffers of the rich.—Surely, then, (if ever,) you are now bound to extend a Constitutional relief to citizens who are suffering under these sad reverses, and to qualify them by active occupation to attempt to retrieve, not only their own affairs, but the general prosperity. Many, very many, of these persons are ready and anxious to resort to industrious callings, and to relieve the nation from the weight of their support. And it is certain that those who are not supported by their own industry and resources, must subsist, in some way or other, upon the labor or resources of others, and are a dead weight on society. They eat the bread of others, as was expressed by the honorable gentleman from Delaware, and are "nati consumere fruges;" the fruits which they consume belong to their creditors.

Sir, all these suggestions are again met by the old objection to the power of Congress to enact retrospective laws, and it would seem as if the distinction between retrospective and ex post facto laws, instead of being manifest and clear, was without reality.

He was then compelled to repeat, what was familiar to every civilian, that an ex post facto law created the crime which it punished, but a retrospective law had no necessary relation to crimes or offences. Every ex post facto law is retrospective, but the converse of the proposition, that every retrospective law is ex post facto, cannot be sustained. Of these, the first description is repugnant to the fundamental principles of humanity and justice, and is expressly prohibited by the Constitution. But retrospective laws, in their correct and general signification, are applicable to civil contracts, controversies, and concerns. Even these should be passed with great caution, and in cases only of indispensable necessity. Insolvent laws fall under this rigorous character of necessity. And, therefore, although they do effect what in ordinary cases would be a violation of private right by extinguishing the obligation of contracts, yet this power was undoubtedly vested in the several States, and exercised, under some modification, by most of them in this particular instance. Many other examples of this species might be adduced from the practice of the States, all of which could not be justified by this plea of necessity.

This right of regulating the affair of insolvency, so far as it was claimed and applied in acts impairing the obligation of contracts, was taken from the States and transferred to the General Government. The entire argument is comprehended in the following propositions: A bankrupt act, ex vi termini, may be retrospective. Congress has the exclusive power of framing such an act; and, of consequence, Congress may, and the several States may not, make acts in relation to bankruptcy, the operation of which may be retrospective. The present bill, he said, defined the various delinquencies which were intended to constitute acts of bankruptcy. These must be committed subsequently to the passing of the act. In regard to them, the law would be in no respect ex post facto or retrospective. But he would not disguise his expectation and intention that its operation should be retrospective upon all contracts existing at the time of its passing. So that, though the delinquency constituting a bankrupt should be posterior, the salutary influence of the provisions of the law should reach back to those children of misfortune who were not the less entitled to relief because their trouble was of long duration. A law which would not extend to antecedent cases would lose its principal value in his estimation. His object was to set free from their shackles all honest debtors of the classes designated in the act, who could bring themselves within its provisions, with the consent of the competent number of their creditors. Nothing short of this was worthy of effort.

The next objection (said Mr. O.) to the bill, urged as well by those who do, as those who do not entertain the Constitutional doubt, is the liability of the bankrupt system to the danger of frauds. To this it was easy to anticipate the general answer, that the objection was not peculiar to this bill, but lay at the bottom of all legislation upon nearly every subject. Laws against murder might give birth to frauds and perjuries also. Those against theft and the receiving of stolen goods were frequently the sources of fraudulent practices of various descriptions. The revenue laws of the country might be considered as a fertile soil, in which frauds were produced in perennial crops. The great volume of balances not accounted for by the receivers of public moneys (which, being too huge to lie upon his table, he had been obliged to place under it) would furnish materials for a history of all sorts of frauds, without including the accounts of individuals whose balances were merely apparent, and those who had been prevented by inevitable casualties from closing their accounts. It was no objection to a law, that it was susceptible of fraudulent evasion; and, though nothing more certainly roused the jealousies and prejudices of honest minds than the cry of fraud, yet it was an ingredient died in the wool, and spun in the yarn, and woven into the texture, of all the laws to be found in the statute book. But, in order to show the peculiar exposure of a bankrupt system to the evasions of fraud, resort is had to the experience of foreign nations, and of our own country.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has occupied nearly a day in reading passages from minutes of evidence taken before a committee of the British House of Commons, appointed to inquire into the operation and defects of their laws; and the honorable gentleman from Virginia has adopted the same course, though not to the same extent. They have cited detached opinions, and partial extracts bearing upon the abuses and imperfections of the system, and those only. Sir, to all examples of this species, it would seem sufficient to reply, that this same committee, upon a full view of all this evidence, made a report of certain improvements of which they thought the system to be susceptible, but were far enough from recommending its abolition; and the British Parliament, swayed no doubt in this instance by the prevalent sentiments of the mercantile interest, have not yet adopted even those improvements. It was then, he believed, a novelty in legislation, that the evidence taken before the committee of a foreign legislature should be adduced in the Congress of the United States, to the end of inducing them to come to a result precisely the reverse of that which had been attained by the constituent body to whom the report of such committee had been made. This was inviting the Senate to do, upon very limited information, what the Parliament had refused to do with a full knowledge of the subject. The conclusion was undeniable that Parliament, after long experience, deemed an adherence to the system with all its imperfections to be preferable to its renunciation, and considered it, on the whole, better than any substitute that had been matured. He had for some time been possessed of a copy of the documents introduced by those gentlemen. They had been sent to him by an English merchant, eminently conversant with the course of trade between this country and England, and with the operations of the bankrupt system there, and our mongrel systems here, at his request, to furnish him with materials for the defence of the act, and accompanied by a letter strongly expressive of his assurance that it would elevate the credit of the American merchants, and of the hope that this Government would perceive the utility and necessity of the English bankrupt act, or something like it.

Mr. O. then proceeded to a brief examination of the contents of some of the depositions taken before the British committee, and in particular to that of Sir Samuel Romilly, (who, as he contended, was the best informed and most competent judge of the whole merits of the system,) and repeated and enforced the assertion, that it was not the aim of those intelligent persons to abolish, but to reform the bankrupt system. That the principal defect of that system, as has been stated by his honorable friend from Delaware, was its revolting severity, which, being capital, prevented the punishment of the fraudulent bankrupt; and that a careful comparison of the entire testimony of the witnesses before the committee of Parliament with this bill, (which he should not now undertake,) would demonstrate that many of the minor defects were obviated. He entirely dissented from the doctrine of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, maintaining that France, Holland, and other commercial nations, had rejected the bankrupt system, as a scourge and a curse; and he had yet to learn that any commercial nation had persevered in doing without one. So much, sir, said he, for the general objection of fraud, and the report of the committee of the House of Commons. Let us approach nearer to particulars.

It would be admitted that the sources of fraud, so far as the bankrupt was concerned, were twofold—concerted acts of bankruptcy and concealment of property. As to the first, he had no doubt that if the bill should pass, it would give rise to manifold acts of concerted bankruptcy, and he was ready to declare his persuasion, that such a concert was not immoral nor injurious in its own nature. It became so only when accompanied by unjust priorities, given to favored creditors, or by an exhibition of fictitious debts, to facilitate the obtaining of a certificate. If a man were in failing circumstances, and honestly disposed to surrender his effects for the use of all his creditors, an agreement between him and one or two bona fide creditors to do, for that purpose, an act which, if done without such agreement, might be (against his consent) converted to the same purpose, was in itself certainly neither a shame or a sin. Sometimes it would be wickedly and fraudulently perverted. Sometimes the best systems will be abused; but the act was intended to guard against malpractices, undue preference, and fictitious claims—and much would depend upon the fidelity of those employed to give it effect. In any event, relief would be given to thousands of honest and suffering victims to misfortune, and the maxim would be found substantially applicable, that it is better for the guilty to escape than the innocent to be punished—especially as the creditors of the ill-disposed will get nothing whether they become bankrupt or not—and consequently sustain no real injury, even when fraud takes place.

With respect to the danger of fraud from the concealment of effects, it was hardly possible to imagine that any system could be more prolific of abuses of that description than already prevail under the various and conflicting laws of the different States. Frauds in all shapes and varieties that human ingenuity could devise were perpetrated in every State, and under such disguise as defied the scrutiny of State laws, or State courts. These had furnished topics for eloquence on many former occasions, and their frequency was familiar to every individual whose attention had been called to the subject. The absurdities and inconveniences incident to the collision of State laws, would suffice to furnish a theme that might well occupy more time than was reasonably to be employed by any one member who attempted merely to present a general view of the question. But he would refer those who were inclined to bestow upon that part of the subject a special attention to a most luminous and learned argument in the case of Sturgis and Crowninshield, by an honorable member of the Senate, (Mr. HUNTER,) which might justly be regarded as a model of classical taste and forensic eloquence.

That argument, taken in connexion with the decision of the case, whereby it appears that the right of the States to establish systems of bankruptcy is expressly disaffirmed, demonstrates the absolute necessity of a national system for the more effectual prevention of fraudulent concealments, and defeating the contrivances and combinations to cheat creditors, for which the State laws, in truth, at present operate as a bounty and strong inducement. The real difference in the account of fraudulent practices with and without the proposed system, would be found principally to consist in this, namely, that a dishonest debtor, in order to avail himself of the advantage of the act, might be guilty of a single prevarication, or make, once for all, a fraudulent arrangement to cover his property, exposed, however, to the risk of detection by the vigilance of those who would be interested to unmask him; but, without this system, he would find the greatest motives for taking up fraud as a profession for life; it becomes his only resource and vocation, and, by the aid of friends, he can pursue it with impunity. Nay, in one event, those who are tempted to be guilty of one deviation from the path of rectitude, may be left to return to it, and make some amends to society, by a confidence that the fruits of their future industry will be their own; while, in the other event, they will proceed in their career of fraud, consuming the property of their creditors, and finding in the perpetual thralldom to which they are doomed, apologies and salvos for honor and conscience, until all sense of them is extinct.

If these suggestions are correct, a bankrupt act, under its least favorable aspect, will be auspicious to the public morals in the same proportion that occasional frailties, with a chance of reformation, are preferable to habitual and unrepented vice. It was, however, not only to the frauds of the bankrupt, but the expense, delay, and detention of money by assignees, that objections had been made. He did not remember that, under the experiment of the former act, grievances of this kind had been the subject of complaint. Without doubt assignees, like other agents, were sometimes guilty of mismanagement. Here again the comparison of evils must be taken into view, as in all human institutions, and the choice lay between leaving all in the hands of a debtor or a favored creditor, from whom nothing could be obtained, or placing all in the hands of an assignee, chosen by the creditors, and accountable at their pleasure.

He would next advert to the very formidable objection pressed with so much earnestness by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, and which, being indeed the basis of his argument, was entitled to a distinct consideration. He, Mr. B., alluded to the experience of this nation under the former act. It was taken for granted, that this act, after a fair trial, had been condemned by the deliberate sense of the nation, and repealed at the solicitation of those by whose procurement it had been enacted; that it was a disgraced and pernicious system, and held in universal reprobation. But this view of that subject was much too strong. The apparent disfavor into which that system fell, was not a true test of the sober opinion of the mercantile community at that time. In the first stage of its operation, it was calculated to excite great attention and animadversion. Great numbers of individuals were seen rushing towards this new avenue to freedom at the same time. The process of deliverance was generally rapid and easy to all who undertook it. Very many were seen emerging from an obscurity in which they had pined until their misfortunes, and sometimes their names, had been forgotten. Some appeared whose characters and conduct were held in no estimation, and others whose circumstances were not suspected. How was it possible that a sight of all the insolvent merchants and traders in a great nation, suddenly brought together in public array, should not produce a great sensation among friends and enemies? From the nature of the case, they must have had both enemies and friends: by enemies, he meant persons hostile to their discharge. Unless two-thirds of the creditors were friendly, they could not have obtained their certificate. Unless some individuals were averse, they would have had no occasion to adopt this mode of obtaining their deliverance. Among these adverse creditors of course would be found much of vexation and disappointment, and of open and clamorous censure and crimination of the debtor's contract, and justification of their own rigor and opposition. Thus the consenting creditors, feeling no interest in a concern which they had abandoned, would no longer make it an object of thought or conversation, while the dissenting creditors would be stimulated, by the irritation of their feelings, to make loud and constant complaints against the operation of the act, and to become active in their endeavors to effect its repeal.

Under these circumstances, the great mass of insolvent persons, having accomplished their object, could not be expected to unite their efforts in any strenuous opposition to such repeal. The still greater number of assenting creditors would be equally passive, as their bad debts were now spunged, and their motives for an active interference were exceedingly diminished. So that the old set was thus left in the hands of its zealous and bitter opponents, and fell, without a struggle, under the odium of one part of the mercantile community, and indifference of the other.

He would not deny, however, that there were to be found everywhere many highly respectable and impartial merchants who were originally opposed in principle to the old system, and who were for a time confirmed in their prejudices by observation of its effects. But, so far as his information extended, those very individuals had generally become the friends and advocates of another trial. The tables of both Houses had been covered with petitions from merchants and traders of unsuspected credit, from every quarter. He knew only of the single remonstrance against it to which he had before alluded. The petition in its favor, from Boston and its vicinity, was first signed by a gentleman (Mr. Gray) who had long been ranked as the first merchant and ship-owner in the United States, and by far the greater number of eminent merchants and established traders in his part of the country. Indeed, he held in his hand a letter that day received from an association of persons of known worth and credit in the opulent town of Salem, distinguished for commerce and enterprise, and the sound judgment of its citizens, zealously urging upon him to lend his feeble aid to the good work. The sentiment in its favor is indeed universal; consequently, the honorable gentlemen could take nothing by his argument from experience, for experience was in its favor.

He would not allow that a single experiment deserved to be dignified with the name of experience, which he admitted to be the best and only sure guide in the political as well as the physical world. Experience was the result of an impression made by a succession of events in a course of time, and of circumstances and of benefits and evils to be weighed off and balanced against each other. And, as the opinion of the mercantile community had at length settled down in favor of a bankrupt act, and surmounted and laid aside their own objections after a fair trial, both with one and without one, it was now strictly correct to say that experience was not against it, but proclaimed with a loud voice and final decision in its favor.

But, if any doubt remains of the beneficial effect, even of the old act, with all its imperfections and all the malversation ascribed to it, let those who entertain it take an enlarged view of its consequences. Has society, on the whole, lost or gained by the extinguishment of the debts of the thousand who availed themselves of its benefits? Were not the means and fruits of industry increased by restoring them from the idle to the laborious and productive classes? Has any great inconvenience or public calamity grown out of the system? Would it be advantageous to their creditors, or in any respect desirable to replace them in their late state of embarrassment, were this practicable? These are the inquiries to be made by statesmen. Let them ask, what on the great scale is for the good of the nation? and not whether here and there will be found cheats, and swindlers, and fraudulent bankrupts; nor whether, in some instances, cunning devices and sham bankruptcies will not be carried on under the umbrella of the proposed bill. Objections, he regretted to say, were again presented in behalf of the landed interest; indeed, he might say, in behalf of all those who were not expressly comprehended within the purview of the statute. Nothing could exceed the embarrassment which had always been made to involve the friends to this measure. When they attempted to frame the bill in the words of the former act, an outcry was raised against the generality of its provisions. All classes, it was then said, were to be subjected to this odious law, in order to please the merchants; when they offered a bill embracing the yeomanry, and other trades and professions, it was still less graciously received. It was stigmatized, then, not as a bill of privilege, but of penalties, not at all desired by any but merchants, and which, if they wanted it, should be confined to their own order. Twenty years ago its friends were placed in this dilemma;

it is now the same. A bankrupt act was not, in ordinary cases, adapted to the circumstances of farmers and planters; but, if honorable gentlemen would admit that this part of their constituents were ready for it, and if the comprising of them in the bill would reconcile them to it, he was ready at a word, for his part, to say, put them all in. But he knew that gentlemen would consent to no such thing, and that farmers would regard a bill of universal application to the landed interest as a Pandora's box, and not as a boon. He therefore implored them not to preclude others from a benefit which they did not want for themselves, nor to urge objections which they did not wish to remove, nor to suggest, as amendments, provisions which they would not agree to adopt by the friends of the bill. Although planters and farmers were not made subject to the penalties of the act, they would partake of all its benefits, in their capacity of creditors, equally with merchants, and certainly would be placed upon a footing of greater security than they at present stand. They would be dispensed from all trouble, vigilance, and anxiety, to prevent the near and favorite creditors of a failing person from availing themselves of their better means of information and knowledge of his circumstances, and securing themselves to his exclusion. At present a country creditor had little chance of saving any part of a debt from the property of a failing debtor in a seaport or trading town. He was commonly at a distance, and precluded from all opportunity of inspecting his course of business and deviation from punctuality. He depended for his advices on those who were sometimes interested to deceive him, and when, in the event of failure, he came to look after his debt, he found every shilling taken by the nearest creditors. But, on the contrary, under this act, the vigilance and attempts at security of the most zealous and best informed of the creditors must be exerted for the benefit of the planter and farmer, in common with their own. He appropriates to his own use the advantages of their agency, without additional expense or trouble. A favorite creditor can do nothing fairly for himself which does not redound to the benefit of all, and unfair proceedings are more liable to detection and abrogation by remedies growing out of the statute, and pursued by the united efforts of all the creditors, than by the solitary zeal of a single person.

Sir, said he, these are some of the general and prominent principles of a measure recommended to the attention of the Senate by the most urgent calls of humanity and justice, by the wants and sufferings of thousands who are deprived, by the construction given to the Constitution by the Supreme Court, of every other hope and resource. He would not exhaust the patience of his hearers by even touching upon the details of the bill, for which, if it was sustained, ample opportunity would be afforded, not only to himself, but friends who would do them more justice. He relied upon a magnanimous spirit of liberality, to extend aid and protection to every class of people without favor or partial affection. They had just passed an act for the relief of public debtors—an act of unprecedented generosity, and passed with unexampled harmony. Reciprocity of legislation, among the various interests of the country, ought not to be introduced into legislative bodies as the sole motive for the support of a measure. But without reciprocal candor and good will among the representatives of those various interests, and a just attention and respect to mutual circumstances and necessities, while every thing would be conceded to a predominating interest, all other and minor claims would be sacrificed.

In this view, it was the duty of those whose constituents were relieved by the act just passed for the ease of the purchasers of public lands, to look abroad upon the exigencies of their fellow-citizens. The one had experienced the parental kindness of Government, in anticipating their day of trouble, and been delivered from all fear of the future, while the last are groaning under a weight of realized and long continued affliction, with a prospect of interminable wretchedness, without your assistance. It was impossible to remain blind to the least evil consequences of a rejection of the bill. No man can be insensible to the manifold mischiefs which follow in the train of insolvency and pauperism. These will be infinitely multiplied by the general state of embarrassment pervading the country, and indeed their natural tendency is to multiply themselves. A scene will be presented, in this free country, which will be without parallel—thousands of slaves for life, and each with a number of masters; and these slaves our brethren and fellow-citizens, and doomed to this condition as a penalty for misfortune! And, if this be the least, what will be the greatest evil arising from this state of things? What may be expected when their numbers shall be increased, and they seriously commence a system of measures for obtaining that relief, by their active efforts, which is denied to their supplications? What could be more appalling and inauspicious to men of property, and to Government itself, than to see organized, self-created corporations of debtors, embodied in all the great commercial towns, and formed into one vast combination, to influence elections! What state of things more dangerous than an universal alliance among all classes of debtors, public and private, to effectuate their own freedom, through the instrumentality of persons chosen into Congress, with no other recommendation! How should you be pleased, sir, to see the great commercial States represented in Senate by delegates from an established order of insolvent debtors?

He wished not to enlarge upon the topic, nor to assign reasons, satisfactory to his own mind, for believing that these hints were not merely visionary. He earnestly implored gentlemen not to drive these persons to despair, by again postponing their petitions. No language could describe the longing expectations, and eager hopes, and distressing fears, of the vast population that are awaiting your decision. Upon it depends the fate of fathers and of families; and the notice of further delay will overwhelm them with sorrows too heavy to be borne. He therefore trusted that the Senate would not consent longer to protract this state of disquietude, which it was so easy to relieve, and that the motion to postpone would be rejected.

THURSDAY, February 8.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of War, exhibiting the names of the clerks employed in the several offices attached to the Department of War, and the sums paid to each; and the report was read.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of David Chambers, of Ohio, praying to be allowed, in payment for any public land he may enter, a credit for three hundred and twenty dollars, being the first payment made by him for a quarter section of land, which has become forfeited to the United States; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, obtained leave to bring in a bill to establish a new land office in the State of Mississippi, and for the better regulation of certain land districts in the States of Alabama and Mississippi; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. PARROTT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of William Vaughan, reported a bill to reward Lieutenant Gregory, his officers and companions; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

The bill concerning the process of execution issuing from the sixth circuit court of the United States, for the district of Georgia, was read the second time.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, from the Committee on Finance, made reports unfavorable to the petitions of James Graham, of Joshua Aubin, and of William Whitehead.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. MILLS, of Massachusetts, delivered his views at large, and at great length, in support of the bill; and

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. President, when a claim is urged with ability and perseverance, and when, moreover, it is presented in the name of humanity, whoever opposes it speaks with reluctance, and is heard with impatience. And if reliance is to be placed on the prophetic suggestions of the two honorable members from Massachusetts, there may be some danger in opposing a bankrupt system. According to these gentlemen, such is the power, influence, and combination of the applicants and their connexions, that unless we prudently yield all they ask they will conspire, not only to control your elections and embarrass your Government, but even to dissolve the Union.

Sir, it has more than once been my misfortune to be obliged to oppose the wishes and interests of some of my best and dearest friends. I do it with extreme regret. But I have established my maxim: Let a man deliberate well, settle the principle with himself, and then march up to his duty, and if he falls a victim to popular excitement, he has the consolation that he falls for his country.

I know very well the unwillingness of gentlemen to examine a bill consisting of sixty-four sections and fifty-three folio pages. You take up this volume with a view of particular examination, and every member is chilled to his fingers' ends. The able and eloquent advocates of this system perceive this, and very adroitly profit by it. Finding that sober reason has no relish for this subject, they appeal to the passions, and, displaying their brilliant parts, so dazzle our eyes that we can neither seek after the truth, nor distinguish it when we have found it. The honorable member from Massachusetts who first addressed you, (Mr. Otis,) seems determined that our feelings shall get the better of our understandings. Quitting the matter and merits he leads you to the prison, and "through the twilight of its grated door" presents you a captive, "half wasted away with long expectation and confinement," and you witness "the sickness of the heart which arises from hope deferred." You see him "pale and feverish; for twenty years the western breeze has not once fanned his blood; he has seen no sun nor moon in all that time, nor has the voice of friend, of kinsman, breathed through his lattice." He is seated on a "little straw, which is alternately his chair and bed; a little calendar of small sticks is laid by his side, notched all over with the dismal days and nights he has lingered there. He has one of those little sticks in his hand, and with a rusty nail is etching another day of misery to add to the heap." "As you darken the little light he has, he lifts up a hopeless eye towards the door, casts it down, shakes his head, and goes on with his work of affliction." Your sensibility is roused, and breathless you wait for the proposed relief. The orator pauses; here, he exclaims, here, pointing to the bill, is the remedy! This is the physician who can bind up his wounds, and apply the balm of comfort to his aching heart. This is the apostle of liberty. He unlocks the prison door, the captive comes to the light. You see him restored to his family, witness the ecstatic embrace, the convulsive sob, the agony of joy. In a moment, and as rapid as lightning, the sun of prosperity bursts upon him, the bounties of Providence are poured into his bosom, he is surrounded with ease and affluence, wife, children, and friends! Who can descend from these regions of fancy to grope and grovel through fifty-three folio pages of verbose and barbarous statute law?

But, sir, as much reason as there is to despair of a patient examination of the subject, I shall proceed, without preamble or apology, to state my objections to the bill, and endeavor to maintain the following propositions:

1. To regulate the relation between debtor and creditor is the peculiar province of the State government.

2. A bankrupt system is opposed to the genius of our Government and interests of the people.

3. This bill is particularly objectionable, as its operations would be expensive, unequal and unjust.

The power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies is, with one exception, the only municipal power granted to the Congress of the United States. The exterior concerns of the United States and the relations between the several States were very properly confided to Congress. The local interests of the people of a State, and their relations with each other, were as properly reserved to themselves. This rule of distinction ought to have been observed without exception, and the peculiar condition of the people at the time the Constitution was framed, is the only apology for granting this State power to the Congress of the United States. At that time public and private credit were low, the Government was without funds or credit, and private confidence was nearly destroyed. The best funds could be purchased at a discount of fifty per cent.

To restore public credit Congress may levy and collect taxes; to restore private confidence they may regulate commerce. Should these means fail, and the people be oppressed with debts and unable to pay, as a last resort, they may exercise this municipal power, and pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. So far is this grant of power from making it imperative on Congress to exercise it, that it is only to be resorted to in the extremest necessity. If all the powers granted to Congress were to exclude a discretion on the propriety of their exercise, we must then have constant direct taxes and perpetual wars.

I had been taught to believe that one of the greatest excellencies of our Government consisted in the adaptation of local legislation to the peculiar wants, necessities, and interests of the people. Congress will find enough to do in regulating the foreign concerns of the States, and in passing and executing laws for this purpose, adapted to the condition of twenty-four, and, perhaps, thirty different sovereignties. All these local authorities have different manners, habits, and institutions. Their codes of laws on the subject of contract vary as they are old or young, commercial or agricultural, or as exigencies may require.

Now, while the powers of creating, executing, and discharging contracts belong to the several States so long as the parties remain solvent, it seems absurd to suppose that, after a man fails, his affairs may be transferred to, and be regulated and disposed of by, the United States, with any prospect of a correct result.

The differences in the State laws, so much complained of, are far from being a blemish in our institutions. Every State understands its interest, and will take care that its laws shall be calculated to promote it. To invite an efficient population; to encourage an influx of active capital, and to rival a neighbouring State, will be the objects of the local legislatures. The differences, therefore, in the institutions of States, are a constant source of instruction and competition. The citizen of one State, in giving credit to one of another, very well understands that he must enforce his demand according to the laws of the State where his debtor lives. There, the laws, it is to be presumed, will be wise, and not so much calculated to tempt runaway debtors, always a nuisance, as to invite creditors and capitalists, whose wealth and energies will promote the interest of the State.

The difference, too, as to the frequency and magnitude of frauds, and the kind and degree of punishment arising out of the manners, habits, and employments of the people, would prevent the operation of any general law, but with partiality and injustice.

This system is urged because the States have attempted and failed. And how does this reason bear upon the subject? If the States have tried and failed, what better prospect of success have you? You have learned nothing from experience. The State of Pennsylvania had a bankrupt system so long ago as 1785. That State is distinguished for its civilians and statesmen. It is the land of Penn and Franklin. The people are proverbial for their simplicity and unvarnished morality. And, yet, with all these talents and virtues, and this experience, they have totally failed to devise any practicable way to discharge a debtor on delivering up his effects. New York has been equally unfortunate; a State great, commercial, enterprising, and ambitious; a State which has furnished men who would have honored Rome in her proudest days. But even New York, with all these "appliances and means to boot," has failed, totally failed, in a bankrupt system. Connecticut, too, which claims more morality and religion than any other people ever did or will possess, has met with no better success; and other States, equally respectable, have been equally unfortunate. Yet, in other branches of jurisprudence, they are all pre-eminent. Political and civil rights are well defined; fraud and oppression prevented, and crimes punished. The judiciary of some of them would not suffer by a comparison with that of the United States or any other country. And, yet, a law to divide an insolvent's effects and discharge him from his debts, can be no where equitably enforced. Sir, the reason is in the system itself. You increase the temptation to fraud, and attempt to prevent it by laws cruel in their character, unequal in their operation, and uncertain in their application. It savors of vanity to expect that, after so many unsuccessful attempts by the local authorities, with power to adapt their laws to their condition, we could invent a system that would remove all former obstacles, and equitably apply to so many different interests. Have you been, hitherto, very successful in enforcing laws against strong temptation? Let experience, during the non-intercourse, and embargo, and war, answer the question.

This grant of power to the United States is not exclusive. No federal power is exclusive, unless by expression or necessary implication. This grant is not expressly prohibited to the States, nor is it prohibited by necessary implication. Where Congress has power to pass uniform laws, in the exercise of this power, they can control the State laws on the same subject. They can make uniform rules of naturalization, a uniform standard of weights and measures, and uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. The rules, standard, and laws, when established, will control or modify every State law that stands in the way of their uniformity. But, until Congress shall have legislated on the subject, these powers remain dormant and inoperative, and the States can exercise them. They can neither be said to be exclusive nor concurrent, but alternate. When those of the United States are exercised, those of the States must be suspended; and, when the former are suspended, the latter revive. This was yielded by the court in the celebrated case of Sturgis and Crowninshield; and, although I am not disposed to give implicit confidence to those decisions of the court which settle the limits of federal powers, yet, as this is an admission against the extension of those powers, I would regard it as the testimony of a witness who swears against his interest.

In the case to which I have just alluded, the court decide that a State insolvent law, which discharges a debtor from a debt existing at the time the law was passed is void, as being repugnant to that clause of the Constitution of the United States which prohibits a State from passing any law "impairing the obligation of contracts." Although I do not consider myself, as a legislator, bound by judicial exposition of the Constitution of the United States, and am by no means satisfied that this prohibition upon a State was ever intended to extend to insolvent laws, still, as it is not necessary to my purpose, I am not disposed to contest the doctrine. A State law then, discharging a debtor from an existing contract, is unconstitutional. This decision creates little or no necessity for us to legislate on the subject. Those States which have found it for their interest, have long since enacted such laws. In some of them these have existed thirty, and in none less than twelve or fifteen years. There are few contracts, existing at the time of their passage, which could now be enforced against their statutes of limitations.

The States which have made no provision for a debtor's discharge, have deemed it inexpedient, and, consequently, have no wish that you should exercise a power which, until very lately, they had no doubt they possessed, and which they would have exercised had the interest of their people required it.

But, if a State law discharging a debtor from an existing debt, is void, for the single reason that it impairs the obligation of a contract, what right have you to pass such a law? Have you a power given in the Constitution of the United States to pass a law so odious and tyrannical? Will it be said that, because a State is expressly prohibited, and the United States are not, this power is consequently granted? I have not yet come to the conclusion, that every thing not prohibited in the Constitution is granted. The converse of the proposition is true, that whatever is not expressly granted, is prohibited. Do you suppose, sir, that, had there been no prohibition, Congress could have passed a bill of attainder or ex post facto law? Or, because these are prohibited, and the prohibition to impair the obligation of contracts omitted, that Congress now possesses this power? If so, we might make a grant of land to-day to A, and tomorrow rescind it, and grant to B, and on through the alphabet, so long as we could find any one foolish enough to buy.

If the power is expressly granted, it is in the clause which authorizes us to pass uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies. This power is, like every other to pass laws, prospective, but not to operate on acts already done. Congress can define and punish piracies, regulate commerce, and punish counterfeits; but the laws for these and all other purposes must be prospective. We have power to establish a system of bankruptcy which shall operate to discharge future contracts, but never to violate the faith of those existing at the times it was made. It is not essential, or incidental, to the exercise of this power more than any other, that it should be retrospective; and, as that to impair or violate existing contracts, is odious and tyrannical, it cannot be exercised by the Congress of the United States. It is then manifest that you have no more power than a State to pass a retrospective bankrupt law.

The right of a State to pass a prospective bankrupt law has been no where exclusively surrendered. Here I am aware that I shall be met by another decision of the Supreme Court, which goes to clip the wings of States even in this particular, and to establish a principle which disrobes them of almost their last attribute of sovereignty. In the case of McMillan vs. McNeil, from the State of Louisiana, in a very defective and clumsy report, the court are made to say, that, whether the contract existed at the time the law was enacted, or not, it made no difference. There must have been some mistake, for I deem it impossible that the court could ever have gone this length. But, whether they made this decision or not, it is one to which I will never subscribe, or make the basis of legislation, and against which I will forever most solemnly protest.

If this decision is to prevail, it indeed becomes Congress, and especially this Senate, the guardians of State rights, to look about them, gather up the fragments, and see if those that remain are worth preserving.

The grand objects of the framers of the Constitution were "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." To carry into effect these benevolent and patriotic purposes, they established the Federal Constitution, granting certain defined and specified powers; and, lest the States, in their sovereign capacity, should interpose to prevent the accomplishment of these purposes, certain restraints and prohibitions were imposed on them. That "a more perfect union," may be formed, the States were prohibited to enter into "any treaty, alliance, or confederacy." That the "peace, welfare, or defence" of the Union may not be impaired, they could not "declare war;" nor do acts leading to, or provoking it. That "justice" should be "established," they are to "pass no bill of attainder, ex post facto law, nor law impairing the obligation of contracts;" all of which are retrospective, and therefore unjust.

Sir, what is the obligation of a contract? It is the law itself, in existence at the time the contract is made, and forms the basis of the contract. Without a law a contract could have no obligation. It is the tie which binds the parties, the power of enforcing a contract, which is its obligation. There may be contracts without obligation, that is, without a law to enforce them. It is preposterous and absurd to speak of a present obligation of a future contract. You may as well speak of a quality without supposing a substance. You may as well imagine the roundness of a ball, the smoothness of a surface, or the beauty of a woman, without the existence of those objects, as an obligation without a contract.

There can be no obligation until the contract is made, and then the existing law becomes its obligation, its basis, and the rule by which it is to be enforced and discharged. Take the clause in connexion, and its object admits of no doubt. It was to prevent retrospective laws. You shall "pass no law of attainder." This is a legislative conviction and judgment, and thereby retrospective. Nor any "ex post facto law." This makes that act criminal which was innocent when done, or increases its criminality. It is, therefore, retrospective. Nor a "law impairing the obligation of a contract." This makes that contract bad which was good at its creation, and is therefore retrospective. But break down this line of distinction, and where will this prohibition end? It is essential to every well-regulated community that it should have power to control parties in the formation and execution of their contracts. To deny to some an obligation or law to enforce their contracts is essential to the morals of the State; to prescribe to others the rule by which they are to be created is essential to its commerce; and to define the terms and condition of their discharge is no less important to prevent injustice and oppression. A law making gambling, wagering, or usurious contracts, void, would, so far as it should operate upon existing contracts, legally created, be repugnant to this clause in the Constitution. But no one, I presume, has yet pretended that such a law might not operate on all contracts thereafter made. A law which makes certain contracts voidable, by a less or different consideration from that agreed on, or on a contingency not stipulated, if retrospective, would be void, but not otherwise. That a State can prescribe that, if it is agreed to pay above a certain interest, the party promising may discharge himself by paying a lesser sum, has hitherto, I believe, admitted of no doubt. The same may be said of those laws which extend an equity of redemption, or relieve from the penalty of a bond.

The plain reason of the distinction is this: The law existing at the time the contract is made is the known rule which is to govern its discharge. Why, then, I ask, if an insolvent law exists at the time the contract is made, by which the parties understand that, in case of insolvency, and a disclosure, and dividend, the contract is to be discharged, is it not a perfectly fair transaction, and completely within the scope of ordinary legislation? If this prohibition extends to this case, it must unquestionably extend to that of usury, and all the others which I have mentioned. This extension of this prohibition is unwarrantable and alarming. It is usurping the powers of the States, and robbing them of nearly their last vestige of sovereignty. And, sir, allow me to say, that the pretension is novel and unprecedented. In a case decided not long after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, the distinction for which I contend is clearly recognised. Judge Wilson, who was one of the Convention, regrets that this prohibition did not "extend to all retrospective laws," admitting that it was limited exclusively to such. The expression was probably borrowed from the celebrated ordinance of 1787, and it is remarkable that the prohibition there is against an interference with contracts, &c., "previously formed." Sir, the expression itself, the reason, the precedents, and the policy, are all against the construction of the court.

I know it is the fashionable doctrine, that the court are exclusive expositors of the Constitution, and that, by our oath, to support it, we swallow every exposition, however absurd. But I never did, and I never will, swear to support a glaring absurdity, nor dangerous usurpation. Est boni judicis ampleare jurisdictionem, is a maxim very well understood by judges. With this maxim, the right of exclusive exposition, and this broad construction of prohibitions upon States, judges of less integrity and more ambition might, at some future period, trample on the States, and annihilate their sovereignty. Look at the constant encroachments of the Federal on the State Governments, the executive, legislative, and judicial pretensions, and, I ask, how long, at this rate, will your local authorities have an existence? Sir, such is the progress of power; it is like our progress in vice, and we do that at last, with firmness of nerve, from which we should shrink with horror at the commencement of our course. The advance of power is not only onward but upward. "With an eye that never winks, and a wing that never tires," it soars above. Casting all human rights beneath its feet, its course is among the stars. Nor is it satisfied until it can scale heaven, and seize upon the throne of Almighty God. Let the gentleman from Virginia, who sits by me, the peculiar guardian of State rights, now invoke them. It must be like the invocation of departed spirits. He may call them from the vasty deep, but they wont come. He may speak of them, and speak to them, but it must be, not of something that is, but of something that was: "Like the memory of joys that are past, pleasant and painful to the soul." Like the recollection of some dear departed friend who visits you in visions, and embraces you in dreams. You awake—the vision is gone; the endearing phantom is escaped from your arms.

But, I beg pardon, my province is to reason, not to declaim. I trust I have proved, as I intended, that a State has still a power to pass a prospective bankrupt law, and you have no more.

But, suppose the power to be exclusive and unlimited in the Congress of the United States, I still maintain that its exercise is inexpedient, and will be pernicious. The individual distress which gentlemen so feelingly describe is unquestionably magnified. I wish they could all be presented here, and each individual case could be scrutinized and exposed. I would first select all who were fraudulently secreting their property to be used after their discharge, and arrange them by themselves. As another class, I would then take the smugglers and swindlers, who, in attempting to defraud the Government or individuals, had failed of success. The next class should be composed of spendthrifts and prodigals, who had long been knowingly wasting money, not their own, but which had been intrusted to their use, by the confidence and charity of friends. And, last, but not least, all those who, too indolent, and too proud, or too impatient to seek a living by honest industry, had undertaken a business which they did not understand, and had experienced the fate which usually awaits every unskillful pretender. Then, from the prudent, skilful, honest, and unfortunate trader, deduct all those whose creditors are disposed to grant them relief, and I ask, will not your army of insolvents be much diminished? But, would you not pardon the vicious and imprudent, and relieve them? Yes, could I do this without encouraging them to vice and extravagance again, and tempting others, by witnessing their success, to imitate their example. I scarcely know on what ground to meet the honorable gentleman. At one time, it is compassion for the debtor that absorbs all other considerations; at another, the system is a punishment upon the debtor, and is demanded only by the creditor. The honorable gentleman from Delaware (Mr. VAN DYKE) has probably taken the only fair and rational ground; that it is intended for the relief and benefit of both. Assuming this as his basis, it must follow, that a bankrupt system is to increase the confidence and security of the creditor. When his money is loaned, he is better satisfied to be sure of a part, under this act, than to risk the whole under the existing laws. The lender is safer, and will be encouraged to lend. If the borrower fails, he is sure to be discharged from his debt; and, if he succeeds, he may make his fortune. He, then, will be encouraged to borrow. The facility of credit, then, is doubly increased. It then resolves itself into a question of national policy; is it expedient or prudent, at this time, to encourage people in running in debt?

There is scarcely a country in the world where enterprise is so much encouraged. With a Government imposing no restraints, and a population intelligent, enterprising, and avaricious, the spirit of speculation has become general and extravagant. There is probably not a nation on earth whose trade, in proportion to its wealth and population, exceeds that of the United States. It is double that of Great Britain, treble that of Holland, and six times that of France. In these times of depression even, our annual exports are greater than were those of Great Britain the years immediately succeeding the American Revolution. There seems to be in man an irresistible propensity to speculation. The aversion to labor, its slow returns, avarice, and the fascinations of chance, all conspire to lure us into its vortex. In this country are superadded the facilities of freedom, the prospect of success, and the ardor of a bold, daring, and restless population. Add, further, the ultimate safety which a bankrupt system affords, and you are at once overwhelmed with extravagance and prodigality.

The arch usurer is all this while cherishing this spirit, spreading his snare, and exhibiting the bait to lure the ardent and unsuspecting youth within his gripe. A victim to these temptations, the son of an honest farmer, bred to the plough, sets out with a fictitious capital, without skill and without experience. Provided he can trade, he thinks little of his pay. The allurements of long credit, cheap goods, and a new trader, soon exhaust his store. His debtors, when too late, have found the truth of the maxim, that if a man is tempted to buy what he don't want, he may soon want what he can't buy. His day of remittance has arrived; his goods are all out on credit; he becomes bankrupt. He is subjected to the order of the commissioners; the farce is played, and the gentleman bankrupt is discharged of all his debts, and ready to impose on some other people in some other village. But what is the fate of his debtors? Thousands of petty demands must be transferred to the lawyers, and each of them prosecuted in the Federal courts. Yes, sir, in the district or circuit courts, which alone can have jurisdiction under this act; and a debtor to the amount of five dollars may be summoned or attached to appear at the distance of two or three hundred miles, and eventually be compelled to take up his residence in a loathsome prison, while the gentleman bankrupt trader is at his liberty and his ease.

This is not all. This forced, unnatural state of things awakes the cupidity of the prudent, quick-sighted, and avaricious, and, from the avails of these wrecks of extravagance and folly, immense fortunes will be accumulated. The economy of consumption will be impaired, and productive labor diminished, and in both ways will the revenues of the country be reduced. The few will be rich, and the many poor; wealth will accumulate, and population deteriorate. And here the economist and poet agree that—

"Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
Where wealth accumulates, and men decay;
Princes and Lords may flourish and may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made;
But a bold yeomanry, their country's pride,
If once destroyed, can never be supplied."

This bill, sir, will provoke enterprise, even to madness. A young, bold, adventurous American wants nothing to urge, but much to restrain him. He launches into the ocean of life; reason should be his helm, and experience his compass. His passions are his sails, good or bad fortune, prosperous or adverse winds; and the wiles and delusions of an artful and treacherous world, are the rocks, shoals, and quicksands, which lie concealed at the bottom. By this act you urge him into unknown regions, amid dangerous seas and tempestuous skies; you give him a life boat by which he can preserve himself; but you expose his owners to ruin, and his crew to destruction.

Is this all? Would to Heaven it were. But dangers and difficulties increase as we proceed. Our way seems to lead through a dismal and dreary desert, where there is nothing to enliven, cheer, or exhilarate; where every step we take is attended with peril and disaster.

Sir, the Constitution is a charter of limited powers. Congress can do little, but by individual example, to improve the morals or religion of the community. Our business is to regulate the condition and instruct the understanding, but not to improve the heart. As we can do little to inculcate virtue, let us take care to do nothing to encourage vice. Is it not enough that you tempt man to become the sport of capricious fortune? Is it not enough that you delude him to rank speculation, which beggars him and his family? But will you superadd an irresistible inducement to perjury and fraud? "Lead us not into temptation," is an invocation prescribed by one who well knew the frailty and depravity of the human heart. And he illustrated the necessity of this invocation, by showing that one of his favorite disciples, in the face of a solemn admonition, and in spite of the most endearing attachments, in an hour, too, when his love seemed to be most needed, could deny his lord and master with an oath! We need not the aid of inspiration to perceive that man is inclined to evil as the sparks are to ascend, and that the hearts of very many are "deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked;" every day's experience proves the melancholy truth. Few of the best, perhaps, are proof against strong temptation. We have all a weak side—a favorite propensity. Some love of wealth, power, or fame, or some other love, interposes to detach us from duty, and operates as a Syren to lure us upon the Scylla and the Charybdis while we navigate the dangerous channel of human life. The idol of the merchant is his love of speculation. This is so irresistible that even disaster and ruin will not abate, but rather increase it. And does not your bill add to the temptation? If it does not, I admit freely that these remarks are inapplicable. Take, then, two men, equally insolvent, equally moral, and having equal means to conceal property from the eye of the creditor. One is subject to the existing laws, and the other to your bankrupt law; and which has the strongest temptation? The concealment of the first must be perpetual. He must be always upon his guard; he constantly imagines that he is suspected or betrayed; his trustee or confidant may become false, or death may throw the deposit into other hands; and, last of all, the property can never increase, but must constantly diminish, and he is forever debarred from indulging in his favorite employment. The other is subjected to a severer ordeal; but the trial is short. In a few weeks, perhaps, he is discharged; the concealed treasure comes to the light; he proceeds with an effective capital. No one knows from whence it came, and no one has a right to inquire. Sir, the difference is beyond comparison.

And will you tempt men to fraud, and then restrain them by sanguinary laws? Your attempt will be worse than fruitless. The difficulty of detection and discrimination, the disproportion between the crime and the punishment, our abhorrence of cruelty, and our charity and compassion, will all combine, and form an insuperable barrier to conviction. But your law will have another and most deleterious effect upon the community. A law so obnoxious and unequal will become unpopular, and impair your attachment to all your laws. While other nations are bowing in adoration to a man or a family, it is our glory that our idol is our Constitution and laws. Weaken this affection, and it will take a different direction, and attach to some other object dangerous to your liberties. And, sir, there is another principle which ought to be remembered, that if a law is too sanguinary for the genius of your Government or habits of your people, you must either abandon your law or change your Government and habits, to make them conform.

But I would not obtrude my sentiments upon this Senate, on this or any other subject, were I not supported, much lest were I contradicted, by experience. Experience is our best instructor, and without it the calculations and predictions of the wisest statesman fail. Our inclination to imitate is so strong that, finding other nations have bankrupt laws, we, without considering the differences in the necessity and power of enforcing them, conclude they are also expedient for us. If honorable gentlemen would adduce England or France in proof of their expediency, they must compare those nations with ours at the time their bankrupt systems were invented and built up. From 1543, the time of the statute of Henry 8th, to 1571, when that of Eliza, justly considered the foundation of the British system, was passed, what was the condition of the commerce of England? It was literally in its infancy, and carried on principally in foreign ships, navigated by foreigners.

The passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope, and the discovery of the rich mines of America, had given commerce a new impetus and new channels. The Dutch prohibited a second hand India trade with the Portuguese, had pursued it to its source, and wrested it, in a measure, from these monopolizers, and had monopolized it in their turn. Lisbon had succeeded Venice, as the emporium of the East, and Cadiz had become the emporium of the West. The republics of Venice and Genoa, rivals in commerce, as in arms, had wasted their mutual strength in fruitless contests; and the former was now no longer a barrier to the Turks, who were pressing hard upon Christendom. Five hundred hostile ships were approaching each other, and the fate of the commerce of the Mediterranean seemed suspended on the event of a single battle. Elizabeth saw, at her own door, Antwerp, the resort and grand exchange of the North, and Amsterdam, treading fast upon its heels. Her own tonnage, then engaged in foreign trade, was less than that of a second-rate port of the United States at this day. Her circulating medium was short of four millions sterling; her interest was then established at ten per cent., and there was not an insurance office, nor a bank, in the kingdom. The merchants of the Steelyard, a company of foreigners, had monopolized the commerce, as had the Jews of Lombard street the money transactions of the kingdom, and her own merchants were obliged to seek employment abroad.

This wise but arbitrary monarch was determined to correct these evils, and wrest commerce from the hands of her neighbors. Among other regulations to prevent her subjects from emigrating, and to encourage their creditors, and give them a preference, she established a bankrupt system to divide the effects of an absconding British subject exclusively among British creditors. This act of Eliza, intended to punish and restrain a British debtor, held his future effects liable for his debts. A final discharge was given by the statutes of James, and perfected by those of Anne. It is not till then that a bankrupt system becomes emphatically an inducement to speculation, and an instrument of fraud, and then it is the cause and effect of extravagance. Prodigality is its parent, and prodigality its offspring. How nearly contemporaneous the wild speculations of England and France with the improvements in their bankrupt systems! The acts of Anne were in 1706-'7-'16. The ordinances of France were in 1702, 1716, and in 1720. The South Sea and Mississippi bubbles had burst, involved thousands, nay, millions, in ruin, and brought the two nations to the verge of destruction.

Why, sir, should we, in every thing, become the humble copyers of Great Britain? Her Government and policy may require what would be pernicious to us. Distinctions and discriminations are the basis of her Government—equality is the basis of ours. There sanguinary punishments are familiar, and may be enforced; here it is impossible. There the system has been in progress for centuries, and has become familiar, and interwoven with her code on contracts. The United States have no such code, and never can have; and, after all, it is far from being certain that a bankrupt system has benefited the nation, or that, were it now for the first time proposed, it would be adopted. We have seen, by the report of the committee of the House of Commons, the operation of the law, and its defects. The evils are not corrected, nor is the system abandoned. But we very well know, such is the structure of their Government, that abuses cannot always be corrected, or mischiefs removed, and that the courts are often obliged to devise means to evade laws which are opposed to the interest of the nation, but of which the monarchy or aristocracy prevents the repeal.

You go abroad, then, and the lessons of experience are either equivocal or against you. At home, you admit that the experiments by the States have totally failed. As every resemblance may be more or less imperfect, reasoning from analogy is seldom or never conclusive. Could we find an experiment of our own, it might be made the basis of a correct result. Let us then see what has been our own experience.

The subject was brought before the House of Representatives at the first session of the first Congress, and committed. At the second session a petition of the merchants of Charleston, South Carolina, for a bankrupt law, was presented, committed, and a bill reported, and made the order of the day. At the first and second sessions of the third Congress the same proceedings were had, and at the first session of the fourth Congress a bill was reported, acted on, matured, and rejected, by ayes and noes. The subject was not revived until the second session of the fifth Congress, 1798 and 1799, when a bill was brought in, and at the next session, on the 4th of April, 1800, finally passed.

The passage of this bill could scarcely be considered as the voice of the nation. It was in party times, and, as all the gentlemen of one political sect voted against it, and all the others, with very few exceptions, in its favor, it is not improbable that political considerations had some influence on the decision. When we consider, moreover, that it was near the time of a new apportionment of Representatives, and perceive that those who voted against the bill actually represented a majority of the people, and that the House was divided, forty-eight and forty-eight, and its passage was effected by the casting vote of the Speaker, it will not, I trust, be even pretended that it was called for by public opinion.

Such was its birth, and its advent was hailed as a jubilee by some honest and unfortunate men, and by all the spendthrifts and swindlers in the community. What was its progress? The monster came forth, fraud his companion, supported by perjury. Justice threw away her scales, modesty covered her face with her mantle, and innocence fled in a fright. What was its end? Like the rest of the wicked, it scarcely lived out half its days. It was limited to five years, and thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and, when a little more than half that period had expired, it had become so odious and detestable, that all parts, all parties, all professions, and all classes, united against it, and it was repealed by the almost unprecedented unanimity of 99 to 13!

Let me not be told that it was most unpopular at first, because it embraced numerous existing cases. If its operations were as intended, the greater number of objects the more necessary, and therefore the more popular, the law. A law, armed with all the terrors of sanguinary penalties, would not be infringed, nor evaded at first. The timid would stand aloof, waiting for the ingenuity of counsel, or the decision of courts, to point out the weak places, and prescribe the manner of evasion. The frauds committed under any bankrupt system will continue to increase until they shall become familiar, and matters of course.

What then says experience? It speaks with a loud and emphatic voice, "This is a way in which ye shall not go. On one side is vice in affluence, on the other virtue in misery. Here criminal levity, there sanguinary cruelty, and at the end you will inevitably meet confusion and infamy." But gentlemen imagine that experience has pointed out the dangers, and they are prepared to shun them.

We hear much of the perfection of this bill, and, as it is too long to be read, its excellencies are taken for granted. Much expectation has, to be sure, been excited. The bill was prepared by two of the most learned and cunning lawyers, in the United States, and at the first session of the last Congress it underwent, in the other House, the scrutiny of a very learned Judiciary Committee. The Speaker was distinguished for his power of discrimination, and his discretion had a wide range, as the selection was made from one hundred and twenty lawyers. It was reported, discussed, and postponed. It was revised at the succeeding session, by a committee equally respectable—at the last endured the ordeal of this Senate, and now it comes to us, reported by your Judiciary Committee, aided by the additional industry, and experience, and wisdom, of the honorable gentleman from Delaware. And, after all this, what have they brought forth? It has the same form and features, and, with very few and trifling exceptions, is the very image and superscription of the odious and detestable act of 1800.

This, sir, would bring me, where I assure the Senate I am not disposed to go—into a particular examination of this tedious bill. I shall take a shorter, and, I trust, better course. I have collated this with the act of 1800, and in about five minutes will show you the result. They both include the same persons. With two trifling variances, the acts of bankruptcy are the same. The petitioning creditors have the same qualifications, and are subjected to the same proceedings; the appointment, number, power, and duties, of the commissioners are the same; the creditors are to appoint the assignees, in the same manner, and by the same majority of interest; they are alike removable and responsible, and their powers and duties are alike; the bankrupt is subjected to the same ordeal; he is entitled to come in three times within the forty-two days, and incurs the same penalties for refusal; he must surrender and disclose his estate; what he has sold, and if he expects any profits; must assign all and deliver up all; the powers of the commissioners over him are alike, and he is subject to like proceedings and punishments: he is entitled to the same support for his family pending the process, and the same per centage in the distribution; and the same persons or tribunals must consent before he obtains his discharge, and his certificate is to have the same effect. The two acts vary in a few particulars. This commences presently, that commenced at a future day; this fixes the pay of the commissioners, that left it to the judge; this excludes farmers, graziers, &c., expressly, that by implication. This has a few provisions not found in the other. It excludes persons becoming merchants, &c., with design to take the benefit of the act; prevents a bank corporation from unreasonably withholding a certificate, and gives the United States' courts jurisdiction in all cases. It omits obliging a wife to swear against her husband. This is a bird's eye view of the two: and what have you gained by these trifling variations? That this should commence presently, I do not object; for the sooner it begins to operate, the sooner the people will be disgusted with it, and demand its repeal. Paying the commissioners by the day will promote procrastination. The difference, however, is trifling, but the change is for the worse.

The express exclusion of certain persons is an unquestionable blemish. You define who are included, and particularize others who are excluded; and what is to be the condition of those who are neither embraced by the provision nor the exception? Is it the intent to embrace all not expressly excepted? Such would seem to be the principle, and yet its operation would be utterly unjust. There are both injustice and obscurity in the proviso, and it is an unquestionable defect. And the exclusion of those who become merchants to partake of its benefits is still worse. How are you to decide on the intent? Were it a question ever to be in contest between the parties, it is a fact of difficult proof. But, here both the parties will be agreed against the proof of such intent. The petitioning creditor is for bringing the debtor within the description, or else he would not petition. The debtor who designs to make himself a merchant or trader, is of the same opinion, and the commissioners are to decide a question where both parties agree. You have then no other way to detect an infraction of this provision, but by contesting the validity of the certificate after it is granted, when all the property is consumed by commissioners, assignees, officers, agents, and lawyers. Your provision, as to bank corporations, amounts to nothing—it might as well extend to any other creditor. And the jurisdiction given to the United States' courts is an evil of such magnitude, that I have neither time nor patience to discuss it.

There is, however, the omission of a usual provision which I approve. You will not compel a wife to disclose the fraud of her husband. Indeed! And is it a merit that this Senate, so distinguished for their gallantry, should have refrained from a provision so barbarous? Is it not rather a source of mortification that such a rude and savage provision should ever have disgraced our statute book? Sir, we live in the nineteenth century, and have some claims, I hope, to civilization. A man was once in affluence, "the candle of God shone on his head, and by his light he walked through darkness. His children were about him; he washed his steps with butter, and the rock poured him out rivers of oil." But, the storm of adversity began to beat upon him, and in an unlucky and inconsiderate moment he conceived the design to shelter himself from the impending danger, and lay aside a portion for the protection and sustenance of his family; and his wife is called to disclose the fraud. On the one hand, she must call upon her God to witness a falsehood—on the other, she consigns herself and children to misery, and her husband to a perpetual dungeon. What would an affectionate wife do? What ought she to do? She would swear him innocent. And "the accusing spirit which should fly to Heaven's chancery with the oath, would blush as he gave it in, and the recording angel, as he should write it down, would drop a tear upon the word and blot it out forever." But still, sir, the omission adds nothing to the efficacy of your system. Nay, it rather shows the defectiveness of a system, for whose support you have been obliged to resort to principles at which the soul of a civilized man would revolt. No, sir, take all your deviations from the act of 1800 together, and, instead of helping the matter, they make it worse.

But, the most odious principle in the bill is that of discrimination. You desire uniformity, and make the most invidious distinctions. A merchant or trader in Louisiana must be put on the same footing with one in Maine. Yet a person in either of those places, living in the same neighborhood, and even in the same house with another as good as himself, is entitled to different laws for the protection of his liberty and prosperity. And yet we are told the farmer and manufacturer do not want it. If either of these is utterly insolvent, what policy should hold him forever liable any more than the merchant? When gentlemen tell us of the inability of these to make prompt payment, and that to subject them to this process against their will would be cruel and oppressive, and expect us to receive this as an insuperable objection, they pay us no compliment. It really appears that gentlemen were disposed to pacify us, no matter how. Your objection is answered in a word. Let the same process be had against the farmer and manufacturer, with this simple addition only, that on being summoned he should not be held to further proceedings without his consent. The apology for excluding him is frivolous, indeed.

Is not the farmer subject to equal risks? He has his perils by water, and his perils by fire, and adopt this discriminating principle, and he will have his perils too among false brethren. Droughts, inundations, diseases, insects, and fires, are his ministers of destruction. Suppose, sir, some of these children of adversity now before you, and applying for relief. The first is a dealer in bank and other stocks. He purchased United States' Bank stock to an amount ten times more than he was worth, while it stood at only one hundred and fifty per cent. It fell. He failed, and he tells you that as this bank facilitates commerce you ought to relieve him for its sake; and his claim is allowed. The next is a manufacturer, who has withstood a change of times, and foreign and domestic competition; but, in consequence of the failure of the first gentleman, he must fail too, and he prays you to put him on the same footing. But, no; he purchases his stock, applies the labor, and sells the manufactured article; he gets his living chiefly by labor, and is, therefore, excluded.

The broker comes next. He tells you that he commenced business a year ago. He was then worth nothing, but his friends put money into his hands, and his speculations were profitable. But, unfortunately, as the large sums were constantly passing through his hands, some occasionally stopped by the way. He took the funds of his patron, and converted them to purposes of speculations of his own, and he failed. This worthy, faithful, honest, useful citizen is entitled to your relief. A fisherman immediately succeeds him. He built his vessels, employed and furnished his men, sent them to the straits or banks, received, cured, and disposed of the cargoes. But the tempest sunk and destroyed his ships, while cultivating the nursery of your seamen, and he asks relief. But he does not get his living by buying and selling. He builds his vessels, but not to sell. He catches his fish, but does not buy them; he is excluded. A merchant comes and he tells you that while you were engaged in that wicked war against Great Britain, goods were scarce and the wants of the community required that he should attempt to import some in spite of your laws. The prospect was so tempting, and the war so unjust, his interest and conscience both agreed that it would be right. His importations were large, and he was on the eve of independence, when your revenue officers like so many harpies, pounced upon him, seized his goods, and your unrelenting courts condemned them. A man so worthy and patriotic is entitled to your first consideration, and you grant him all he asks.

The plain unvarnished farmer comes next. His family was large, his sons were growing up, he sold and went into the wilderness, purchased and expected to pay for his lands with their aid, and make farms for all; but unforeseen misfortunes assailed him. His crops were destroyed, his cattle died, the fires in the woods caught and burnt up his dwelling, and sickness and death deprived him of the anticipated help of his family. The pay day is come, he is insolvent, and he claims your interposition. But you are a farmer, and farmers don't want the act. Yet, nevertheless, as your case is hard, we can tell you how you may contrive to get within its provisions. Purchase a barrel of rum or whiskey, become a trader, keep secret the design, and, by the time the barrel is out, you may apply to some friendly creditor—he will petition against you, you will be declared a bankrupt, and be punished by a discharge from all your debts. These men would undoubtedly go away feeling the highest respect for your laws and the profoundest reverence for the makers.

There is an excellent story of a father whose son wished for his portion of the estate; it was assigned to him; he went away, wasted his substance in riotous living, was in misery, came back, was penitent, and his father relieved his distresses and forgave him. With a little alteration this story would illustrate our case. Let us then suppose that the father had two sons who wished for their portions that they might depart—the one a merchant, the other a farmer—they receive their property and take their journey into a far country. The farmer purchases his land and cattle, and goes to work, but the merchant wastes his substance in rank speculation, and riotous living. He applies to his brother for relief, and he loans him even all he has. This, too, is wasted in the same prodigal manner, and there is a famine in the land, and they both begin to be in want; and they join themselves to a citizen who sends them into the field to feed swine, and they fain would have satisfied their hunger with the husks which the swine did eat, and no one gave unto them. When they came to reflect, (for hunger will produce reflections,) they say, how many hired servants of our father have bread enough and to spare, and we perish with hunger! Let us arise and go to him and confess that we are not worthy to be his sons, and beg to be received as his hired servants. They go; and while they are yet a great way off, their father sees and comes out to meet them. On the merchant he has compassion, falls on his neck and embraces him, orders a new robe to be put on him, and the fatted calf to be killed, and the music to strike up to announce and welcome his return. The farmer waits until the merchant has received his blessing, as farmers are usually obliged to do. But the father turns to him, and, with an angry look and vindictive voice, exclaims, begone, thou credulous charitable fool, begone! I have given thee all I ever intend; thou hast wasted it upon that prodigal. I have forgiven him, but if I ever do thee, may God never forgive me. Go starve and be forgotten. Would not you denounce such a father as a monster? Just such a father this bill makes you.

But this is not the least odious feature in the bill. Its effects upon an honest and fair debtor will be cruel and oppressive, and, in most cases, the expense of the process will exhaust the whole estate. The commissioners are designated—they appoint their clerk, organize their court, and take care to take bond for their own compensation, and then proceed with all the prudence, economy, and deliberation, of the commissioners under the Treaty of Ghent, whose very modest bill of $194,000 has been presented to you this session, and who intend probably to get another $194,000 before they let you go. It is not to be expected that your commissioners will very much exceed these in integrity, ability, or character. The danger of delay is, then, by no means visionary. Within three or four years an act has passed to revive a commission under the old bankrupt act, some of the commissioners having died, and the business being unfinished after a continuance of fifteen years. And, although I do not expect that one board of these Ghent Treaty commissioners will finish within fifteen years, yet this case shows that those under the Treaty of Ghent are not the only ones who understand the art of procrastination. The outstanding debts placed for collection often in unfaithful or dilatory hands, the right of the assignee to retain to satisfy contingent demands, the power of making demands appear contingent for the sake of retaining the money, the fees of lawyers, judges, clerks, commissioners, assignees, and other expenses, will be enough to absorb a very good estate. You give, moreover, to the commissioners a dangerous, unusual, and unconstitutional power over the secret transactions and personal rights of the debtor. If there is any one personal right that we value more than another, it is that "a man's house is his castle." This invaluable inheritance secures us from violence under color of law, and preserves our own secret concerns from the scrutiny and inspection of unhalloved eyes. Nothing but a crime should authorize an invasion of a private dwelling. The fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution has secured to the people this right to be exempt from all unreasonable searches and seizures, not only in their "persons," but in their "houses, papers, and effects." What are unreasonable searches and seizures? Those which are unusual and contrary to precedent. But you, in the face of this provision, would subject a man's person to be seized, his house broken open, and his trunks and papers ransacked and inspected, for the crime of being in jail for debt, or unable to discharge an attachment. And his remedy is a jury at the discretion of the court!

Punishment of Piracy.

How is it with the dishonest debtor? Not one additional impediment to fraud. If there be any difference, the restraints are less and the inducements stronger than in the act of 1800. And the ultimate tribunal is an assemblage of creditors—a mixture of parents, brothers, children, friends, enemies, competitors, and rivals. This fair, impartial tribunal, possessing coincident feelings and co-ordinate virtue, are, by a complicated majority of number and interest, to give or refuse the last sanction. The doctrine of impartial justice, it seems, has become too common and insipid for modern refinement, and the best tribunal is one the most partial.

I think I perceive in the countenance of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. OTIS,) an intimation that my argument in this particular is a little inconsistent. I complain, at the same time, that the act has too much severity and not enough. Sir, there is an inconsistency, but it is not mine; it is in your system itself. It is a perfect chapter of contradictions. It does give too much power to the creditor, and it does not give enough; it is too severe upon the debtor, and it is not severe enough. To the crafty, evasive, or vindictive creditor, it gives too much power; to the liberal and just, not enough. Upon the honest and fair, but unfortunate debtor, it is too severe; upon the fraudulent, not enough: and the mischief is here—that you have no means, nor is there any power, short of omniscience, that can make the discrimination.

I shall vote against the indefinite postponement, not that I have any hope that any system can be matured so as to obviate my objections, but because the petitioners are entitled to a decision. It is with the utmost regret that I have been obliged to take this stand against the wishes of many good friends whom I desire to relieve; and, when humanity seems to urge, and justice and policy forbid, we oppose with reluctance. But, describe the distresses as you will, magnify and color them with all the power and embellishments of eloquence, and they fall short of the reality, and still I maintain that this remedy is worse than the disease. Nay, more; the remedy itself will produce a relapse which will rage like a pestilence, and sweep like a whirlwind. But I have done. Pass this bill, and I conjure you to alter its title by striking out "uniform system of," and inserting "universal." It will then be, "An act to establish an universal bankruptcy throughout the United States," and the tendency and effect will be apparent in the title. Pass this bill, and it will blight like a mildew; it will corrode like a canker; it will pollute like a leprosy. Pass this bill, and you "smite the land with a curse."

FRIDAY, February 9.

The credentials of the honorable JAMES BARBOUR, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for the term of six years, to commence on the fourth day of March next, were read, and laid on the file.

Mr. DANA presented the petition of William Plumb, of Connecticut, praying to be allowed a pension of twenty five dollars per month during life, in consideration of Revolutionary services and sacrifices; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Josiah Hook, Jr., made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Josiah Hook, Jr., and the report and bill were read; and the bill passed to a second reading.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Levi Chadwick, praying the renewal of a land warrant issued to him for Revolutionary services, and which is now lost; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Oxley, reported that "the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted;" and the report was read.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was recommended the bill for the relief of the purchasers of public lands prior to the first day of July, 1820, reported the same with amendments; which were read.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act further to regulate the entry of merchandise imported into the United States from any adjacent territory," reported the same with amendments; which were read.

PUNISHMENT OF PIRACY.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution of the 4th of December, "to inquire into the propriety of so modifying the law punishing piracy as to authorize the President of the United States, in such cases as he may deem expedient, to commute capital punishments for confinement in penitentiary houses," reported that it is inexpedient to make the modification suggested; and the report was read. It is as follows:

The object of the resolution is to alter the criminal code of the United States so far as to place within the power of the President of the United States the complete control over the punishment now affixed by law to the crime of piracy, and to soften it down from death to the less rigorous punishment of confinement in penitentiary houses.

As we have drawn most of our impressions of the utility and efficacy of penitentiaries from the practical operations of this system in the several States where it has been adopted, it may not be thought improper to give the result of certain official inquiries into the condition, usefulness, and advantages of some of these institutions in States where much zeal and diligence had been displayed to cherish them.

Some time in the year 1817 the grand jury of Philadelphia visited the penitentiary in that city, upon which they made the following presentment:

"That, while they notice with pleasure the high degree of order and cleanliness, they are compelled by a sense of duty to present, as an evil of considerable magnitude, the present very crowded state of the penitentiary; the number of prisoners of all classes continues to increase, so that from twenty to forty are lodged in rooms eighteen feet square. So many are thus crowded together, that the institution already begins to assume the character of a European prison and seminary for every vice, in which the unfortunate being who commits the first offence, and knows none of the arts of methodized villany, can scarcely avoid the contamination which leads to extreme depravity." The same grand jury further stated "that, of four hundred and fifty-one convicts now in the penitentiary of Pennsylvania, one hundred and sixty-one have been confined there before." It is believed that no institution of this character ever received more attention as respects its comforts and means of promoting the reformation of offenders.

The commissioners appointed to examine into the state of the New York prison, not long since, in their report say: "It has for some time past not only failed of effecting the object chiefly in view, but has subjected the treasury to a series of disbursements too oppressive to be continued if they can in any way be prevented."

The commissioners of the prison of Massachusetts, in a report, complain "that the prison is so crowded as to defeat the object for which the institution was created." These commissioners, after enumerating what they consider to be the advantages arising to the Commonwealth, say: "But there appears great reason to suppose that the advantage first mentioned is more than counterbalanced by the greater hardihood and more settled corruption which a promiscuous association among the convicts must produce, particularly the young."

These appear to be fair and impartial representations made by men whose duty it was to represent things as they were, in order to bring to the public view their true character; and if this is the state and effect of those prisons, after twenty years of experience and prudent management, upon convicts whose offences are not of the most atrocious class, but little hope can be entertained that pirates can be reformed by such means.

In the catalogue of human offences, if there is any one supremely distinguished for its enormity over others, it is piracy. It can only be committed by those whose hearts have become base by habitual depravity. It is called by jurists an offence against the universal laws of society. A pirate is hostis humani generis. He is at war with his species, and has renounced the protection of all civilized Governments, and abandoned himself again to the savage state of nature. His flag consists of a "black field, with a death's head, a battle axe, and an hour-glass." These are the ensigns of his profession. He does not select the enemies of his native country as the only objects of his conquest, but attacks indiscriminately the defenceless of every nation; prowls every ocean in quest of plunder; and murders or jeopardizes the lives of all who fall within his power, without regard to nation, to age, or to sex. With such a blood-stained front, a pirate can have no claim to the clemency of a Government, the protection of which he has voluntarily renounced, and against which he has so highly offended.

Our general policy and political institutions are administered so mildly, that we seem to have forgotten the protection due to the public; and call that punishment which the law prescribes for offences, however enormous they may be against the public safety and public morals, cruel and degrading to our national character. The laws punishing piracy with death have had from the legislative department all the consideration due to so important a subject at a time when no undue influence could interpose.

The Executive clemency has more than sufficient range for its exercise, without the aid sought for by this resolution. Whatever may be the public feeling against a pirate previous to his trial and conviction, as soon as that takes place that feeling subsides and becomes enlisted on the part of the criminal. There is not a favorable trait in his case but what is brought up and mingled with as many circumstances of pity and compassion as his counsel can condense in a petition, which everybody subscribes without any knowledge of the facts; and this is presented to the Executive, upon which alone he is to judge the case. All the atrocious circumstances are kept out of view. There is no one hardy enough to tell that this criminal and his associates had boarded a defenceless ship, and, after plundering all that was valuable, had, with the most unrelenting cruelty, butchered the whole crew and passengers; or crowded them into a small boat, in the midst of the sea, without provisions or clothing, and set them adrift, where their destruction was inevitable; or, the better to secure their purpose, had shut all, both male and female, under deck, and sunk the ship, to elude detection, or to indulge an insatiable thirst for cruelty.

The object of capital punishment is to prevent the offender from committing further offences, or to deter others from doing so by the example. If it be commuted for temporary confinement, it can effect neither to any valuable purpose. The temptation is so strong, and detection so difficult and so rare, that but few, it is feared, can be deterred. The punishment of death is inflicted upon pirates by all civilized nations, notwithstanding which it is a growing evil; every sea is now crowded with them, which, instead of diminishing, ought to increase the reasons for inflicting capital punishment.

The committee are of opinion that capital punishment is the appropriate punishment for piracy, and that it would be inexpedient to commute it for confinement in penitentiary houses.

PROMOTION OF EDUCATION.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the resolution of the 11th of January, "to inquire into the justice and expediency of granting land for the purposes of education within the limits of the old States," reported that it is inexpedient to grant lands to the extent contemplated in the resolution, but that it is just and expedient to grant a per centum on the sales of public lands to a reasonable extent, for promoting education in the old States, and to grant an equivalent to the new States; and the report was read. It is as follows:

That, under the laws of the United States, lands have been granted for the purposes of education in the States of Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, and Alabama, in the proportion of one thirty-sixth part of all the public lands within the State, with the addition of two townships, or forty-six thousand and eighty acres in each State, and to Louisiana an additional township, or twenty-three thousand and forty acres. The quantity which is already vested in each of the above States by the operation of this system, and which will vest in them when the Indian title shall have been extinguished, and the whole of the lands are surveyed, will be exhibited with sufficient accuracy for all practical purposes by the annexed estimate of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and is a part of this report. The committee also remark that, by an act of the eighteenth of April, 1806, a donation of two hundred thousand acres of land was made to the State of Tennessee, for the use of two colleges and academies in each county in the State, to be established by the Legislature thereof, and six hundred and forty acres in each six miles square, where it was practicable, for the use of schools; and that a township, or twenty-three thousand and forty acres, was, on the 3d of March, 1819, granted by the United States to the Connecticut Asylum for the education of deaf and dumb persons.

The lands thus granted to the States for the above purposes are not subject to taxation by the State government, and can only be settled in the manner pointed out by the States in which they lie. If, therefore, correspondent quantities for the purposes of education are to be granted to all the old States, (under which term the committee believe all States will be included which have not received donations of land for that purpose,) it would seem that the States and Territories which now contain public land would have an excessive proportion of their superficies taken up with such donations, leaving but a small part of the land in each subject to taxation, or to settlement, except at the will of other sovereign States. In receiving donations of land for the purposes of promoting education in the States in which they have been granted, in the opinion of the committee, a consideration has been rendered therefor, on the part of those States, by the increased value which the population and improvement of the State gave to the unsold public lands, and by the compact not to tax the lands of the United States at any time before they were sold, nor until the lapse of five years thereafter.

The lands, therefore, granted to some of the new States, for the purposes of education, though distinguished in common parlance by the name of donations, were in fact sales bottomed upon valuable considerations, in which the new States surrendered their right of sovereignty over the remaining public lands, and gave up the whole amount which might have been received in taxes before such lands were sold, and for five years thereafter.

The committee are therefore of opinion, that it is inexpedient to grant lands to the extent contemplated in the resolution; but that it is just and expedient to grant a per centum, to a reasonable extent, on the amount of sales of public lands, for the purpose of promoting education in such of the States as have not received the aid of the General Government, distributing the amount among the several States, according to the population of each; and that justice would require an equivalent from the United States to the States and Territories which contain public lands, if it should be deemed advisable to make the donation to the old States recommended in this report; and they are of opinion that, in that event, it will be entirely just to subject to taxation, by such State or Territory, all lands sold by the United States therein, from and after the day on which they may be sold.

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, Feb. 2, 1821.

SIR: Agreeably to your letter of 30th ultimo, I transmit herewith an estimate of the quantity of lands in Ohio, Indiana, Louisiana, Mississippi, Illinois, and Alabama, showing the quantity surveyed in each, the quantity unsurveyed, and the amount of one thirty-sixth part of the surveyed and unsurveyed lands.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

The Senate took up successively the reports of the Committee on Finance, unfavorable to the petitions of James Graham, William Whitehead, and Joshua Aubin.

[The petitioners state that, in the month of October, 1814, they, being subjects of Great Britain, imported certain British goods into Castine, a port of the United States, then in the possession of the British, with whom the United States were at war; that they entered the goods at the British custom-house, and paid the duties; that at the time the United States regained the possession, the collector demanded the duties and that they paid them; and they pray that the duties so paid may be refunded.]

Mr. ORIS moved to reverse the reports of the committee and instruct it to bring in bills for the relief of the petitioners; and after a long debate in which the reports were defended by Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, EATON, and MACON, and were opposed by

SENATE.

Relief to Land Purchasers.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Messrs. OTIS, MILLS, DANA, SANFORD, KING, of New York, and LANMAN,

The motion was agreed to; and the committee were directed to report bills accordingly.

• BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a system of bankruptcy. A number of amendments were made to its details, and others were offered, on which, as well as on the merits of the bill, a good deal of debate took place, in which Messrs. VAN DYKE, TALBOT, OTIS, MILLS, and HOLMES, of Maine, chiefly participated.

Mr. TALBOT closed his remarks against the bill by offering the following motion:

Resolved, That the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States be committed to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report amendments thereto which shall secure to all classes of the community, other than the descriptions of persons contained in the first section of the bill, the privilege, at their election, of becoming voluntary bankrupts, with the consent and approbation of a major part in value of all the creditors of such voluntary bankrupt, previously obtained and duly certified; and further providing that such bankrupt shall be subjected to the same proceedings, and liable to the same penalties, fines, and forfeitures, and be entitled to all the privileges, benefits, and advantages, as are provided for, and made applicable to, all other bankrupts by the regulations of the said bill.

To allow this motion, and an amendment offered by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, (not affecting the principle of the bill,) to be printed, the bill was laid on the table.

RELIEF TO LAND PURCHASERS.

The engrossed bill for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, was read the third time.

Mr. LOWRIE observed, that, from the course this bill had taken, he found himself placed in a situation in which his views without some explanation might be misunderstood. He asked the attention of the Senate, while he compared the provisions of the bill just read, with the one reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

This subject was brought before Congress by the President's Message—by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and by a large number of petitions, as well as by resolutions offered by gentlemen in both Houses. All these were referred to the Committee on Public Lands. Being a member of that committee, I know something of the difficulty and embarrassment they experienced in coming to a conclusion, and in digesting a system, that, without going too far, would give such equitable relief as the situation of the country required. At that time, sir, I was among the warmest friends of this measure; and few gentlemen, except those whose constituents were immediately interested, were willing to give relief to the same extent that appeared to me equitable; I am still willing to go as far as was at first proposed.

The bill reported by the committee has been very ably elucidated by the observations of the two members from Illinois, and by the gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON.) I had also gleaned some arguments which escaped those gentlemen, and which were intended to have been presented to the Senate in favor of that bill if it had been necessary. It would have given me great pleasure to have done so, because the provisions of that bill had the sanction of my judgment, and was in accordance with the feelings of my heart. That bill contained three principles, which, in my view, covered the whole justice and equity of the case. The first was the permission to surrender any portion of the land, and apply the payments to the part retained. The second offered an inducement for prompt payment by giving a discount, which was afterwards fixed by the Senate at $37\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. The third authorized the payment by eight annual instalments, without interest, and without limitation as to quantity. This provision was afterwards so limited by the Senate as to apply to 320 acres only, and an oath was required from each person embracing this provision, stating that he held no more land unpaid for than 320 acres. A section was also added releasing all interest now due. Now, I beg leave to remind the Senate that it was in support of this bill, with these provisions, that the able speeches of the gentlemen, to whom I have alluded, were made. With them I acted in concert until they abandoned the bill they had so ably supported.

But, sir, that bill has been postponed. We have now to pass upon another and a very different one, to which I call the attention of the Senate while I examine its provisions.

The first section contains the principle of the first bill word for word. Connected as it is, however, with the subsequent provisions, it promises no practical effects. Before I resume my seat, I will show that this principle, great and valuable as it was in the former bill, will, in this one, be almost entirely inoperative. The second section releases the interest due; in this it coincides with the first bill. The third section contains the following provisions:

To purchasers at the rate of three dollars and upwards per acre, a discount of $33\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. is given, and to those who purchased at a rate less than three dollars, a discount of 25 per cent.

The residue of the debt thus reduced, is divided into three classes. Those purchasers who have made one payment form the first class; the second comprises those who have made two payments; and those who have made three payments, form the third.

The debt of the first class is made payable in eight, the second class in six, and the third class in four annual instalments respectively. The debt on each instalment bears interest, but it is provided that this interest shall be remitted, on the instalments being punctually paid.

Now, sir, it is to me matter of astonishment that, with these provisions, the Senate are about to pass this bill.

The principle of discrimination between the purchasers above and those below three dollars is to me peculiarly objectionable. I cannot reconcile it with any sound principle of legislation. If any discrimination be made, it should be the reverse of this—the preference should be given to the man who cultivates the land. It cannot be denied that the great majority of the poorer class purchased their land at the minimum price—while your land merchant (I do not use the word speculator) attended your sales and bought the choice land, with a view to his own profit. I know, by our regulations for the sale of public lands, no distinction has been made heretofore, and, therefore, none is now expedient; but my feelings towards these two classes are very different, and, if an extra favor is now to be given, I would bestow it on the man who earns his bread by the sweat of his face.

Relief to Land Purchasers.

SENATE.

Sir, this point was discussed last Saturday, and it is not necessary to repeat the arguments then used. In support of the principle, it was stated, that this provision was for the benefit of those who purchased at a high rate south of the Mississippi river. But high prices were also given north of the Ohio river. In the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, the sum received, up to the 30th September, 1819, above minimum price, was $1,179,179; there can be no doubt that much of this was at a price above three dollars the acre, and thus it appears that, in the last mentioned States, you carry this invidious distinction. It is a singular fact, also, that the purchaser at $275 per acre, will, where three payments are now due, owe a larger sum than if he had purchased at three dollars.

But these objections are of minor importance, when compared with the other provisions. After reducing the debt by $33\frac{1}{3}$ and 25 per cent. you propose to give eight, six, and four years credit, and release the interest on the instalments, if paid when due. If we take the interest which will become due on these instalments, it brings us to the following results: eight years, 27; six years, 21; and four years, 15 per cent. If the discount is taken, we find the following: eight years, $20\frac{1}{2}$; six years, $16\frac{1}{2}$; four years, $12\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Neither of these modes of calculation, however, is the proper one to be applied to this subject. I have therefore taken the mean between the two, which produces the following: eight years, $23\frac{1}{2}$; six years, $18\frac{1}{2}$; four years, $13\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. By adding these respective sums to the discount given in the bill, the extent of the reduction is ascertained:

2d 6	$18\frac{1}{2} + 33\frac{1}{2} = 52$
3d 4	$13\frac{1}{2} + 33\frac{1}{2} = 47$

In the first class, three original payments are due; in the second class, two; and in the third class, one. The average reduction on each original payment, therefore, is $53\frac{1}{3}$ per centum.

1st class 8 years	$23\frac{1}{2} + 25 = 48\frac{1}{2}$
2d 6	$18\frac{1}{2} + 25 = 43\frac{1}{2}$
3d 4	$13\frac{1}{2} + 25 = 38\frac{1}{2}$

In these cases the average reduction on the original payments is $45\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. The mean between $43\frac{1}{3}$ and $45\frac{1}{3}$ is 49 per cent., which is the average reduction on the whole debt due from the purchasers of public land. Besides all this, the interest now due is remitted. These results cannot be disputed; they are as certain as figures themselves.

With these facts in view, let me ask the Senate of what use is the first section of this bill? Will any individual surrender part of his land to pay for the residue, when he can pay his debts with 51 cents in the dollar. If this principle has any operation, it will only be when the land is not worth half the price at which it was originally purchased; and land only of the most inferior quality will be surrendered to the Government.

Mr. L. observed, if this bill is passed, more will be done than any person has yet asked for. He referred to the petitions signed by thousands. All that was asked or expected was a reduction of the existing debt to the present minimum price. But, pass this bill, and you lay the ground for present discontent among the inhabitants, and of future application for relief to other classes. Will A be satisfied to pay you $1 25 per acre, when you have reduced the debt of B from $2 to $1? Will the Legislature of the Nation refuse to hear the man who tells them, that, with great sacrifice and exertion, he paid his debt to the last farthing; that his neighbor, who made no such exertion or sacrifice, has been relieved of half his burden? But, suppose this class rejected; will you, after passing this bill, refuse to hear those whose lands have been forfeited? They will show by the records of the Treasury, that from them you have received $412,670. In the Cincinnati district alone, they will show you $130,756. They will plead the provisions of this bill; and I do not see on what principle you can refuse them.

In this bill you have entirely lost sight of the system of prompt payment. That part of the system is at this time one of no ordinary importance. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the receipts from land, for the ensuing year, at not more than $1,600,000, unless some inducement for prompt payment should be offered. With proper inducements, he estimates the receipts at $2,500,000. The difference between these two, in the present embarrassed situation of the Treasury, is not to be disregarded. This advantage was strongly relied upon in pressing the first bill on the favorable attention of the Senate. In the bill now before us nothing is retained that will be of immediate advantage to the Treasury, and the estimate of the officer at the head of that Department is disregarded.

It would have given me great pleasure to have voted for a bill giving relief on this subject. Had the first bill been sustained by the Senate, I would have given it all the support in my power. It is not a common or a cold feeling I have for the persons interested in this measure. Many of my neighbors and acquaintances have removed to, and settled in the States concerned. My best wishes are for their prosperity; and, if the whole subject should fall by its own weight, which is at least a probable event, I am not to blame—my course on this measure has been a liberal one; it has been consistent and uniform.

The bill was passed and sent to the House of Representatives for concurrence.

The Bankrupt Bill.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

TUESDAY, February 13.

The credentials of ELIJAH H. MILLS, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March next, were read, and laid on file.

Mr. LANMAN presented the memorial of John Parish and others, inhabitants of the county of Windham, in the State of Connecticut, praying for the establishment of a certain post route; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office, &c.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Robert Caldwell and others, inhabitants of Morgan and Guernsey counties, in the State of Ohio, praying for the establishment of a certain post route; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office, &c.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of William Pancoast, made a report refusing the prayer of the petitioner; which was read.

On motion, by Mr. PLEASANTS, the Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from the consideration of the resolution of the 12th of January, "to inquire whether there are any obstructions to the navigation of the river Thames, in the State of Connecticut, which were placed there by the American ships blockaded during the late war, and, if any, what measures ought to be adopted for the removal of such obstructions;" and it was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MILLS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Parker, made a report, accompanied by a bill to extend the term of Samuel Parker's patents, for his improvement in currying and finishing leather of all kinds; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill to establish a new land office in the State of Mississippi, and for the better regulation of certain land districts in the States of Alabama and Mississippi; reported it without amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of George Jackson; and, on motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, it was laid on the table.

THE BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, the question being on the motion, made by Mr. TALBOT, to recommit the bill, with instructions so to modify it as to allow all other classes, as well as merchants, to become bankrupts, on their voluntary application to avail themselves of the provisions of the act.

MESSRS. VAN DYKE and LANMAN opposed the motion, the latter at some length; and Mr. TALBOT advocated it.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion, it was decided in the negative, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Holmes of Maine,

Johnson of Kentucky, Macon, Morril, Pleasants, Ruggles, Smith, Stokes, Talbot, Walker of Alabama, and Walker of Georgia—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Dickerson, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Mississippi, Horsey, Hunter, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lloyd, Lowrie, Mills, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Roberts, Sanford, Thomas, Tichenor, Trimble, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—24.

So the proposition to recommit and amend the bill was rejected.

The question then was stated on the following amendment, submitted yesterday by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, as a new section:

"SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That whenever any person, resident within the United States, not being a merchant or person actually using the trade of merchandise by buying and selling in gross or by retail, nor dealing in exchange, nor as a banker, broker, factor, underwriter, or marine insurer, shall do or suffer any act or thing which is herein described, or declared to be an act of bankruptcy, any one creditor, or a greater number, being partners, whose single debt shall amount to five hundred dollars, or any two or more creditors whose debts shall amount to one thousand dollars, may petition, in writing, against such person in the same manner, and the same proceedings shall be had therein, as directed and prescribed in the second section of this act; and the commissioners designated by the said judge shall, moreover, issue a summons under their hands and seal, notifying and commanding such person to appear at a certain time and place before said commissioners, to show cause why he or she may not be declared a bankrupt, and the same commissioners shall cause personal service to be made on such person, and reasonable notice of the time and place to be given; and if such person shall not appear, or, appearing, shall consent to a commission of bankruptcy, then, and not otherwise, such person may be declared a bankrupt, and shall be subject to all the provisions of this act."

Mr. VAN DYKE deemed the argument against Mr. TALBOT's proposition as applicable to this amendment, and therefore did not conceive it necessary to add any thing on this question, except to say that, were he a farmer, he should not desire to place this power in the hands of his creditors.

Mr. HOLMES defended his amendment in detail, and at some length.

Mr. KING, of New York, spoke against the proposition, and in support, briefly, of the expediency and constitutionality of a single bankruptcy system, applicable only to the trading class.

Mr. BARBOUR replied to Mr. KING, and argued in support of the justice of extending the bill to farmers and other classes, as well as traders, to which the consent of the debtor being rendered necessary, obviated all objection; stating, in conclusion, that if the amendment did not prevail, he should attempt an amendment, to confine the operation of the bill entirely to dealings between merchant and merchant, and to leave the claims of others on them unimpaired.

Mr. VAN DYKE argued to show that the amendment would produce an incongruity in the system, and was in principle inexpedient.

The question was then put on the amendment, and was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Eaton, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Knight, Macon, Pleasants, Ruggles, Smith, Walker of Alabama, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Dickerson, Elliott, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lanman, Lloyd, Lowrie, Mills, Otis, Parrott, Roberts, Sanford, Stokes, Talbot, Thomas, Tichenor, Trimble, Van Dyke, and Williams of Mississippi—24.

So this amendment was also rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR then moved the amendment which he had intimated, and which was to insert a clause providing that, in the dividend of a bankrupt's estate, the debts due to those whose occupation excluded them from the operation of the act, should first be paid. Mr. B. spoke briefly, to show that, as other classes were not to have the benefits of the law, they ought not to suffer by it, and that, therefore, it ought to be confined to debts between merchants, and not affect the lien of the farmer.

Mr. LLOYD argued that this amendment, so far from having the effect to preserve or guard the interest of the farmers, would destroy all the chance which the bill now gave them of deriving any good from it, and would, in fact, be absolutely injurious to their interest.

Mr. BARBOUR replied, and Mr. LLOYD rejoined, in illustration and support of their opinions on the effect of the amendment.

Mr. VAN DYKE contended that the amendment was totally inconsistent with the principles of a bankrupt system.

The amendment was negatived—yeas 11.

The bill was then laid on the table, for the purpose of receiving a report necessary to be acted on to-day.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT.

Mr. BARBOUR then, from the joint select committee appointed on the subject, reported the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the two Houses shall assemble in the Chamber of the House of Representatives on Wednesday next, at 12 o'clock, and the President of the Senate shall be the presiding officer; that one person be appointed a Teller on the part of the Senate, to make a list of the votes as they shall be declared; that the result shall be delivered to the President of the Senate, who shall announce the state of the vote, and the persons elected, to the two Houses assembled as aforesaid; which shall be deemed a declaration of the persons elected President and Vice President of the United States, and, together with a list of the votes, be entered on the Journals of the two Houses.

Resolved, That if any objection be made to the votes of Missouri, and the counting or omitting to count which shall not essentially change the result of the election; in that case they shall be reported by the President of the Senate in the following manner: Were the votes of Missouri to be counted, the result would be for A. B., for President of the United States, — votes; if not counted, for A. B., as President of the United States, — votes; but, in either event, A.

B. is elected President of the United States; and in the same manner for Vice President.

Mr. BARBOUR explained, in detail, the reasons which influenced the committee in adopting the resolutions which it recommended.

Mr. KING, of New York, spoke in particular reference to what he deemed the correct course of proceeding in joint meetings; thinking it consistent with the Constitution, and with propriety, that the House should come to the Senate, if the apartment had not rendered it inconvenient; and that, when a convenient plan should be completed for joint meetings, he hoped the practice heretofore prevailing would not be considered in the light of a precedent, but that they should repair thither, and the President of the Senate preside in the joint meeting, &c. He was opposed to the settlement of any litigated question in joint meeting, where the Senate, as a body, would be lost; and argued that, whenever any such should arise, it would be always proper that the two Houses should separate.

Mr. MACON offered some remarks, explanatory of the views of the committee on the points before them—some thinking the votes of Missouri ought to be received and counted, and others that they ought to be rejected; that they had agreed on the second resolution as the most likely course to reconcile any difficulty. As to the place of meeting, the Chamber of the Senate would have been recommended, (he was understood to say,) but for the reason that it could not accommodate comfortably the two Houses.

The question being put on the first resolution, it was agreed to, nem. con.

On the second resolution a long debate took place. It was opposed by Messrs. SMITH, TALBOT, WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, and LANMAN, on various grounds; principally, for the reasons that it was not competent in the Senate to decide such a question in anticipation; that the proper time to consider and settle it was the day appointed by the Constitution; that the two Houses would not be bound to-morrow by this report; that it was useless to touch the question now, whether Missouri was a State or not, or had a right to vote; that her votes could not be legally known now, &c.

The resolution was defended by Messrs. BARBOUR, OTIS, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on the grounds that, as the question would certainly arise to-morrow in joint meeting, it was much better to adjust it now, and prevent all difficulty or trouble; that it was wrong to allow the pleasure and good feelings growing out of the event of to-morrow, a great and pleasing incident illustrative of our free institutions, to be disturbed by a question which could be so well settled previously, &c.

Mr. KING, of New York, in accordance with the opinions he had submitted, wished some amendment introduced to prevent the mode of proceeding from being quoted as a precedent hereafter—an amendment declaring that, if any question should arise relative to any votes, in joint meeting, that the two Houses would separate to consider the case, and not decide it jointly.

Mr. BARBOUR said that, on the present occasion, as the election could not be affected by the votes of any one State, no difficulty could arise; and that it was his intention hereafter to bring the subject up, to remedy what he considered a casus omissus in the Constitution, either by an act of Congress, if that should appear sufficient, or, if not, by proposing an amendment to the Constitution itself.

The second resolution was then also agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 14.

The Senate proceeded to the appointment of a Teller on their part, in pursuance of the report of the joint committee appointed to consider and report a mode of examining the votes for President and Vice President of the United States; and Mr. BARBOUR was appointed.

Mr. KNIGHT presented the petition of Lemuel White, of Rhode Island, praying a pension; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, presented the memorial of François Dufossat, son of Guy Dufossat, representing that certain forts have been erected and established on his land in Orleans county, in said State, and praying that other lands may be granted to him of equal value in lieu thereof; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Finance, in pursuance of instructions of the 12th instant, reported a bill for the relief of William Whitehead, Joshua Aubin, and James Graham; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. VAN DYKE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of P. P. Saint Guirons and others, French emigrants, engaged in the cultivation of the vine and olive, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted. The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee on the Public Buildings, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings," reported it with amendments; which were read.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, laid on the table the copy of a letter from him to the President of the Bank of the United States, and the answer thereto; which were read, and laid on file.

The bill to extend the term of Samuel Parker's patents, for his improvement in currying and finishing leather of all kinds, was read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on the Judiciary on the petition of William Pancoast; and it was laid on the table.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The Senate took up and considered the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, as amended.

A motion was made by Mr. KNIGHT, of Rhode Island, to include manufacturers in the operation of the system. On which, Mr. K. made the following remarks:

Mr. KNIGHT said, it had been stated by the honorable mover of the bill, (Mr. VAN DYKE,) that it is intended particularly for those who are subject to risks and losses, in their lawful business; for those who intrust their property out of their control and on the ocean. In this provision, I perfectly agree with the honorable gentleman, said Mr. K. And, as the bill does not provide for every class of our citizens, who are subject to great risks and losses in their business, I now move, sir, to amend the bill, by inserting in the — line of the first section, after the word merchant, the word manufacturer. The bill will then read, that, if any merchant, manufacturer, or other persons.

In order to show that manufacturers are entitled to the benefit of the provisions of this bill, permit me to state a few facts. It is well known to gentlemen living in the Eastern section of the United States, that the freshets occasioned by the breaking up of one of our Northern Winters, often do great damage to the mills, mill-dams, and other property belonging to manufacturing establishments. I have known, sir, many persons nearly ruined by these disasters, their labor, toil, and savings for many years, entirely swept away by one of those freshets.

But, sir, water is not the only element to which they are exposed; fire, too, hath made its ravages. I believe, sir, a larger proportion of this kind of property has been destroyed by fire within the last fifteen years than of any other species within the United States. In fact, so frequent has been the destruction of manufacturing establishments by fire, that no prudent person will insure against it. The offices to the East totally reject all applications for insurance on cotton mills. They would not be taken even at what would be called by the merchant a war risk—a premium that no regular business can give in this or any other country. If this amendment is adopted, it will not only include cotton manufacturers, but the manufacturer of hats, woollen, hemp, powder, &c. I would ask, sir, who among us would insure on a powder mill? I presume, nobody, at any premium that could be afforded by the proprietor, unless it was a person willing to be blown up. Then, sir, the manufacturer is compelled to risk and endure all losses that may happen; and, if so unfortunate as to lose his property by fire or other casualty, he is doomed to everlasting misery while on earth; while the merchant, who can be insured, and thereby divide his loss among the community, you exonerate from responsibility; you set him free to seek new fortunes, and to provide for himself and family the means of a comfortable subsistence—

[Here it was observed by Mr. VAN DYKE, that the manufacturer, who gets his living by buying and selling, was embraced in the bill.]

It is now suggested by the honorable mover of the bill, that manufacturers are embraced in the operations of the bill. Be it so. But, if they are embraced in the bill by implication, why object to the amendment? Why not have it clearly expressed? I admit there is no music in the word, yet it will not destroy the harmony of the bill if it should be inserted. Besides, sir, I have been taught to believe that statutes are to be construed strictly, that little is to be taken by implication; and unless manufacturers are particularly mentioned, as such, they cannot participate in the benefits, nor be subject to the operations of the law. Can it be said, sir, that the manufacturer, who merely purchases the raw material, manufactures it into cloth or other commodity, sends it to his factor or agent to sell, is a trader within the meaning of the bill? He does not make a living by buying and selling, and in my mind does not come within the purview of the law. I hope, sir, the amendment will prevail.

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Electoral Votes for President.

SENATE.

Mr. MILLS, of Massachusetts, replied, that he believed the object of the gentleman was now attained; that the manufacturer did carry on trade in such a manner as to be clearly within the meaning of the bill. And to insert manufacturer, was too broad a term; that not only the persons designed by the gentleman would be embraced, but shoemakers, carpenters, and all mechanics, would come in under that provision.

Mr. VAN DYKE repeated, that the manufacturer who gets his living by buying and selling, was now embraced in the bill.

The question being taken on Mr. KNIGHT's motion, it was lost; but ten rising in its favor. The bill was laid on the table.

ELECTORAL VOTES FOR PRESIDENT.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives have rejected the resolution of the Senate declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union. The House of Representatives concur in the report of the joint committee appointed to make arrangements upon the subject of counting the votes for PRESIDENT and VICE PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES, and have appointed tellers on their part, and are now ready to receive the Senate to perform that ceremony.

Whereupon, the two House of Congress, agreeably to the joint resolution, assembled in the Representatives' Chamber, and the certificates of the Electors of the several States, beginning with the State of New Hampshire, were, by the President of the Senate, opened and delivered to tellers appointed for the purpose, by whom they were read, except the State of Missouri; and, when the certificate of the Electors of that State was opened, an objection was made by Mr. LIVERMORE, a member of the House of Representatives from the State of New Hampshire, to counting said votes. Whereupon on motion, by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, the Senate returned to their own Chamber.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House of Representatives is now ready to receive the Senate in the Chamber of the House of Representatives for the purpose of continuing the enumeration of the votes of the Electors for President and Vice President, according to the joint resolutions agreed upon between the two Houses.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, it was Resolved, That the Senate proceed to meet the House of Representatives in order to conclude the counting of the votes for President and Vice President of the United States, according to the last of the joint resolutions adopted for that purpose.

Whereupon, the two Houses having again assembled in the Representatives' Chamber, the certificate of the Electors of the State of Missouri was, by the President of the Senate, delivered to the tellers, who read the same, and who, having examined and ascertained, the whole number of votes, presented a list thereof to the President of the Senate, by whom it was read, as follows:

Number of votes to which each State is entitled.	STATES.	President.		Vice President.

The whole number of the Electors appointed being 235, including those of Missouri, of which 118 make a majority; or, excluding the Electors of Missouri, the whole number would be 232, of which 117 make a majority; but, in either event, JAMES MONROE, of Virginia, is elected PRESIDENT, and DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, of New York, is elected VICE PRESIDENT of the United States.

Whereupon,

The President of the Senate declared JAMES

MONROE, of Virginia, duly elected President of the United States, commencing with the fourth day of March next; and DANIEL D. TOMPKINS Vice President of the United States, commencing with the fourth day of March next.

The votes of the Electors were then delivered to the Secretary of the Senate; the two Houses separated, and the Senate returned to their own Chamber, and then adjourned.

THURSDAY, February 15.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to Congress a report from the Director of the Mint, enclosing a statement of the Treasurer, submitting the operations of the Mint for the last year.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 14, 1821.

The Message and report were read.

Mr. SANFORD presented the petition of Charlotte Read, widow of Thomas M. Read, deceased, late a Captain in the Army, praying to be allowed a pension, in consideration of the military services of her late husband; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1821," reported it with an amendment; which was read.

Mr. ROBERTS gave notice that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. HORSEY gave notice that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a bill concerning divorces and alimony in the District of Columbia.

On motion, by Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions were discharged from the consideration of the petitions of John B. Chatard, David Mallory, William Sizer, and William Plumb; and John B. Chatard and William Plumb had leave, respectively, to withdraw their petitions and papers.

On motion, by Mr. BARBOUR, the Committee on Foreign Relations were discharged from the consideration of the memorials of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New York, and the merchants and underwriters of the city of Baltimore; and they were respectively referred to the Secretary of the Navy.

On motion, by Mr. TRIMBLE, the Senate took up and considered the report of the Committee on Pensions on the petition of Dean Weymouth; and the resolution accompanying the same was amended, and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted, and that the committee be instructed to report a bill allowing him a pension at the rate of twelve dollars and fifty cents per month.

Mr. SMITH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate the original order for building the barracks at Sackett's Harbor, together with all the communications between the War Department and Major General Brown relative thereto, and the amount of public moneys expended thereon.

The bill for the relief of William Whitehead, Joshua Aubin, and James Graham, was read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee on Public Lands on the petition of P. P. St. Guirons and others; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

BANKRUPT' BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. CHANDLER moved to amend the bill by inserting in the first section the following additional proviso:

And provided, also, That no discharge which may be given to a bankrupt, under this act, shall operate so as to discharge the bankrupt from debts which may be due to any persons, except those debts which may be due to merchants, bankers, brokers, factors, underwriters, or marine insurers.

This proposition gave rise to some debate, in which the amendment was supported by Messrs. LLOYD, CHANDLER, TRIMBLE, and ROBERTS, and was opposed by Messrs. VAN DYKE, OTIS, MILLS, and KING, of Alabama.

The discussion resulted in the rejection of the amendment by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Eaton, Holmes of Maine, Johnson of Kentucky, Lloyd, Macon, Morrill, Noble, Pleasants, Roberts, Smith, Talbot, Trimble, Walker of Alabama, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Dana, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Lanman, Lowrie, Mills, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Sanford, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Mississippi—22.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, moved to strike out the 21st section of the bill, which provides that the commissioners shall, on probable cause shown, have authority to issue their warrant to any person or officer, authorizing him to break open, in the day time, the houses, chambers, shops, trunks, &c., of the bankrupt, where any of his goods, or estate, deeds, writings, books, &c., may be, and take possession thereof.

This motion was decided also in the negative, by yeas and nays—yeas 14, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Eaton, Holmes of Maine, Johnson of Kentucky, Lloyd, Macon, Morrill, Pleasants, Roberts, Smith, Stokes, Talbot, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Dana, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Mills, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Sanford, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Trimble, Van Dyke, Walker of Alabama, and Williams of Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, the sixtythird section of the bill was so amended as to provide that the facts of any case shall be tried by a jury, at the election of either party, instead of at the discretion of the court or judge.

Mr. LOWRIE then, with the view, as he remarked, of making the system entirely prospective in its operations, and not touch existing debts at all, moved to add a provision to the sixty-first section, declaring that the act should "release no person who may hereafter be declared a bankrupt from any debt existing at the passage of this act."

On this proposition a long debate ensued; in which Mr. LOWRIE and Mr. ROBERTS maintained the amendment, on the ground of its expediency, without reference to the Constitutional question; and Mr. EDWARDS spoke briefly on the proper construction of the bill as it now stood. Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, and Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, argued that a discharge of debts existing at the passage of the act would be unconstitutional; which opinion was answered and opposed by Messrs. MILLS, OTIS, and VAN DYKE.

Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, though opposed to the bill altogether, was opposed to the amendment, and advocated an entire discharge of the debtor, if the system passed at all.

The question being taken on the amendment, it was negatived by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Eaton, Holmes of Maine, King of Alabama, Lloyd, Lowrie, Macon, Morril, Pleasants, Roberts, Talbot, Trimble, and Walker of Alabama—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Dana, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Mills, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Parrott, Sanford, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Walker of Georgia, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—26.

Mr. TALBOT moved to strike out of the bill that clause of the sixty-third section, which gives to the circuit courts of the United States jurisdiction of all cases in law or equity arising under the act.

This motion was assented to by the friends of the bill, and was agreed to.

Mr. TALBOT next moved to reduce the term to which the duration of the bill is limited, from five years (the time with which the blank had been filled) to two years.

Mr. OTIS proposed to split the difference with the gentleman, and make it four years.

Mr. TALBOT agreed to change his proposition to three years, and in that shape it was adopted.

After one or two unsuccessful attempts by Mr. ROBERTS to amend certain features of the bill, to which he objected; and no other amendment being offered—

The question was then taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed, as amended, and read a third time, and it was decided in the affirmative by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dana, Dickerson, Edwards, Elliott, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Mills, Otis, Parrott, Stokes, Thomas, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Mississippi—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Eaton, Holmes of Maine, Johnson of Kentucky, King of Alabama, Lloyd, Lowrie, Macon, Morril, Palmer, Pleasants, Roberts, Talbot, Trimble, Walker of Alabama, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee—18.

FRIDAY, February 16.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, of the 15th of May last, statements exhibiting the number of militia from each State, that were called into the public service by orders of the President of the United States; the number furnished by each State; the number recognised by the United States from each State, and the period of their service; the amount of fines imposed for neglect of duty, distinguishing the number of persons on whom fines have been imposed, the sums collected, and the sums paid into the Treasury; and the expenses of courts martial in the several States; and the letter and statements were read.

Mr. PINKNEY presented the petition of Nathaniel W. and C. H. Appleton, merchants, and late copartners in Baltimore, praying for the restitution of certain moneys illegally exacted from them for duties on goods imported into Castine, whilst in possession of the British, and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HORSEY obtained leave to bring in a bill concerning divorces and alimony in the District of Columbia; and the bill was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. H. laid on the table a communication from the vaccine agent in Baltimore, exhibiting the present state of the vaccine institution.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, requesting the President of the United States to lay before the Senate the original order for building the barracks at Sackett's Harbor, and other documents connected therewith; and agreed thereto.

SAMUEL L. SOUTHARD, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of James J. Wilson, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat in the Senate.

The Senate, according to the order of the day, took up the bill from the other House, to reduce the Military Peace Establishment; when,

On motion by Mr. SMITH, who wished to offer some remarks on the subject, for which he was not prepared to-day, the bill was postponed to and made the order of the day for Monday next.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the charter of the Bank of the United States, the question pending being on the amendments offered by Mr. ROBERTS; first to make the notes of the bank and its branches receivable by the United States only in the States where they are made payable, except notes of the amount of five dollars, which shall be receivable at the bank or any of its branches. Secondly, that it shall not be lawful for the bank to establish more than one branch in any State without the consent of the Legislature of such State, &c.

Much discussion took place of these propositions, and the others embraced in the amendments, in the course of which,

Mr. RUGGLES moved so to amend the amendment as to make the consent of the Legislature of a State necessary to the establishment of any branch of the bank in such State.

This motion was negatived without a division, and, soon after the bill was laid on the table for the purpose of acting on the message which was received from the other House.

MISSOURI.

Mr. ROBERTS asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

The resolution is as follows :

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the State of Missouri shall be, and is hereby declared, one of the United States of America, and is admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever: Provided, That the following be taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the said State is admitted into the Union, namely: that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution, submitted by the people of Missouri to the consideration of Congress, shall, as soon as the provisions of said constitution will admit, be so amended, that it shall not be applicable to citizens of any State in this Union; and that, until so amended, no law, passed in conformity thereto, shall be construed to extend to any citizen of either State in this Union.

Mr. VAN DYKE, of Delaware, said he hoped the gentleman would not understand him, in making the motion which he was about to make, as offering any disrespect towards him or his proposition; but, Mr. VAN DYKE said, he should consider it unfortunate for the Senate now to take any step in this business. The Senate ought to recollect the course this subject had taken; they had at an early period sent to the other House a resolution for the admission of the State into the Union, containing a proviso which it was hoped would obviate all objection to it. That resolution, however, had been rejected by the House of Representatives. They have informed us, by message, of its rejection, without any indication of what would be acceptable to them; and that message is scarcely cold before we have a proposition to bring forward another resolution. He thought the Senate had better not stir in the subject again so soon; but that it would be more expedient to wait a while at least, and see what the other House should do, if it did any thing. He had no objection to make another effort to get the State admitted, but to make it so soon after the fate of the first proposition had been announced from the other House, would be premature, he thought, and unwise. If the Senate had not moved first in this business, but had now its resolution to send to the other House as an original proposition, he thought it highly probable it would prevail there. With the best intentions, that resolution had been sent there; it had been rejected; and the Senate was as yet ignorant of the form of admission which would be acceptable to that body. He hoped the Senate would keep back, a little longer at least, any new proposition; and therefore moved that the motion to grant the leave asked for, be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. ROBERTS was of opinion that the Senate might, without the slightest departure from propriety or dignity, receive the resolution; and then he should have no objection to laying it on the table for some days; it would then be before the Senate, and gentlemen could give it due reflection. Mr. R. said he offered this resolution from a strong and serious conviction of duty; and, as the session was near its end, he trusted that the Senate would not allow any punctilio to interfere with an object so important. He was one who had been unable to vote for the former resolution which passed the Senate; that having failed in the other branch, he now offered such a one as he could support. He earnestly desired the admission of the State into the Union; it was an object all important to the nation and to its public councils, and he hoped the Senate would so far indulge him at least as to entertain his proposition, and then, if it saw fit, lay it by for future decision.

Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, viewed this proposition as a kind of peace offering on the part of those gentlemen of the Senate who had opposed the former resolution. He was extremely anxious that the question should be settled, and that nothing should be left undone to effect a settlement of it. He therefore acknowledged himself much obliged to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for bringing this proposition forward. Whatever may be the decisions of the other branch, said Mr. W., let us do all we can to preserve the peace and harmony of the Union. He hoped no point of etiquette would interfere with the motion, but that the leave would be granted; that the proposition would be ultimately adopted, and the tranquillity of the nation be restored by the admission of the State without more delay.

Mr. MORRIL, of New Hampshire, adverted to the unpleasant feelings and effects of this long agitated Missouri question; the great portion of time which it consumed of the last and of the present session; the embarrassment it produced in the public business. It pursues us, said he, every where in the House, and from one House to the other, into the committee rooms and out of doors. He sincerely hoped that it might be terminated at the present session, and was a little surprised that his friend from Delaware should make an objection to receiving a proposition which might bring the subject to a favorable issue. The act of the last session concerning Missouri, Mr. M. said, passed both Houses of Congress, and received the Executive sanction. Had that act been properly met by Missouri, there would have been no difficulty in her admission; the former question was considered as settled, and, but for the clause now objected to, her admission would have met with no serious opposition. He thought every effort ought to be made to bring the subject to an amicable issue, and hoped it would be ended by the passage of this resolution. There was nothing, among the numerous subjects before Congress, of more importance, and he thought the Senate ought to receive, without postponement, the proposition now offered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, could not see, because the Senate had done its duty once, that it was to do nothing more. He, for one, was ready to embrace every opportunity of performing it. How, he asked, were the Senate to ascertain the sentiments of the other House, or of each other, but by proceeding in this way? Caucussing was no longer fashionable here, and the distance over which members were scattered completely prevented an interchange of opinions in private. It was the best course to do what they could when the opportunity offered. This subject was of more importance than any other before Congress; it distracted the legislative councils and impeded all other business. An immense quantity of business of the deepest concern to the nation continued before them, to be done during the short remainder of the session—more than he had ever known, even at the commencement of some sessions; yet none of this would or could be done until this all-devouring subject of Missouri was settled. Every other subject was put in jeopardy by it. The relief of our land debtors is endangered—the army is endangered—the Union itself is endangered—those ties which have bound us together as a nation of brothers, have been weakened by this all-distracting question. He would therefore meet it, and continue to meet it, until the 4th of March; he would discard all other subjects to make an effort to terminate and adjust it. We see, said he, that nothing else can be done; we send to the other House bill after bill, but in vain; we hear of nothing there but Missouri, Missouri, Missouri! and thus will it continue until we can end it. Mr. J. avowed that he felt under obligations to the gentleman from Pennsylvania for bringing this proposition forward; and, unless some member would get up and say he was not ready to vote on granting the leave, he should oppose the postponement.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said he would vote against the postponement, because it was an unusual course, and he was inclined to advance, under the hope that this resolution would receive the sanction of the Senate and of the House of Representatives, and put an end to this painful contest. This proposition would either obtain with the other House, or it would not, and though there might be something in its passage now, like a surrender of etiquette on the part of the Senate, yet he would not consider a little matter of form as more important than the adjustment of this all important question. If it should finally fail, a great responsibility would rest somewhere. Gentlemen might smile, he said, but they who treated the subject lightly were far removed from the scene of real excitement. Could they witness the sensations which it produced in that part of the Union where its effects were most to be dreaded, they would think more gravely of it. When the Senate, said Mr. B., shall have manifested a desire, an anxious desire, to settle the question by one more effort, and shall still fail, our skirts will be clear; and let what consequences ensue that may, our records will show that we have done what we could to prevent them. If nothing serious ensue, still we shall have nothing to regret. Mr. B. hoped the proposition would at least be received, if then laid on the table.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, was willing to grant the leave requested, but merely as a matter of courtesy—not from a hope of its doing any good. The Senate had passed a resolution to admit the State; it was sent to the other House, where it was amended, and then rejected. Was it for the Senate immediately to shape another and send to them, or to wait and see if that House would agree on any proposition of its own? If they send us none, it will be evidence that they are not disposed to do any thing. The public mind, Mr. H. said, had been much excited on this subject, but a change was taking place, and the people were beginning to say, let Missouri into the Union—if you do not, let the responsibility rest where it belongs.

Mr. VAN DYKE disclaimed being influenced in his motion by motives of etiquette. He acted from a conviction of its expediency in regard to the object in view—the admission of the State. He believed Missouri would be admitted into the Union before the 4th of March, on a footing with the other States; but he thought it impolitic for the Senate again to take up the subject so hastily, and that he was walking in the plain path of his duty towards Missouri, in regard to her admission, in making his motion to postpone the introduction of this resolution. The proposition was the same in substance as the former resolution, and if there was no difficulty apprehended here, on it, why should it be pressed again so soon; why not allow the other House some time to act on a plan of its own, or at least wait a short time and observe the indications there? The strength of Missouri was increasing in this House at least, and it was prudent to rest awhile, and discover what course the other House was likely to take. The proposition could sustain no injury by the delay; it was before the Senate, in fact, though not in form, for it had been printed and was on the table of each member. All he asked was, that the Senate would hold its hand until Monday next, before it entertained the proposition.

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, concurred in the opinions of the gentleman from Delaware. The Senate had evinced, at all times, a disposition to admit Missouri. It had at an early period of the session, passed a resolution declaring her admission, and sent it to the other House, where it was finally rejected. The Senate knew that many propositions had been before that House on this subject; none of them had succeeded, and there was, consequently, no evidence of a disposition there to admit the State. Nothing would be gained by this resolution but affording to the House of Representatives another opportunity of having the subject before them at large; for this identical proposition, with the exception of perhaps a single word, had already been considered in that House, and been rejected by it. He was of opinion that it would be much better for the Senate now to wait until the other House took some step of its own in the business, as it had rejected the resolution sent down by the Senate. He could perceive no probable good likely to result from the Senate's again acting on the subject; its disposition was undoubted; it had done its duty; and he was for giving the House an opportunity of adopting its own plan if it had any.

Mr. CHANDLER, of Maine, conceived that the Senate had done every thing, so far, that was proper on the subject. If it entertained this proposition, it might prevent the other House from proceeding in its endeavors to agree on some plan of its own; and he was in favor, therefore, of deferring any other step on the part of the Senate for some time at least.

The question being then taken on postponing the motion for leave, it was decided in the negative—18 rising in favor of the postponement, and 20 against it.

The question then being on granting the leave, Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, made a point of order. The 13th of the joint rules of the two Houses inhibited the re-introduction, in either House, without a notice of ten days, of any bill or resolution which should have been passed by one House and sent to the other, and there rejected. Mr. S. conceived that this rule would oppose the introduction of this resolution at this time, ten days' notice not having been given by the mover; and Mr. S. was proceeding to support his objection with some arguments; when

The PRESIDENT overruled the objection taken, referring to the practice of the Senate in former cases.

The question being then put on granting the leave, it was carried without a division, and the resolution received its first reading.

A message having been received from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of the Hon. WM. A. BURWELL, a member of that House from the State of Virginia—

On motion of Mr. PLEASANTS, it was Resolved, unanimously, That the members of the Senate will attend the funeral of the Hon. Wm. A. Burwell, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Virginia, to-morrow, at ten o'clock, A. M.; and, as a testimony of respect for the memory of the deceased, will go into mourning, and wear crape for thirty days.

The Senate adjourned to Monday.

Groce to enter a fraction of land, made a report accompanied by a resolution that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of this subject.

Mr. EATON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Kon-na-noo-lus-kee, or Challenge, of the Cherokee tribe of Indians, made a report accompanied by a bill for the relief of Kon-na-noo-lus-kee or Challenge, one of the tribe of the Cherokee Indians; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

ment of commissioners to lay out a road from Wheeling to the Mississippi; and the bill was read. [This bill provides that the said road shall be so laid out as to pass through Columbus, Indianapolis, and Vandalia, (the seats of government of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois,) and making an additional appropriation of ten thousand dollars for that object.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, from the select committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill supplementary to the several acts for adjusting the claims to land, and establishing land offices in the districts east of the island of New Orleans; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading:

The resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union was read the second time.

COMPENSATION TO MEMBERS.

The report of the committee, adverse to the reduction of the compensation of members of Congress, with the amendment, going to alter the tenor of that report, was next on the orders of the day.

Mr. BARBOUR moved to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. ROBERTS, considering this motion as proposing a final disposition of the subject for the present session, required the yeas and nays on the question; and the yeas and nays on the question were taken accordingly, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Eaton, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Hunter, Johnson of Louisiana, King of New York, Lanman, Mills, Otis, Pleasants, Sanford, Stokes, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Dana, Dickerson, Holmes of Mississippi, Knight, Lowrie, Macon, Morrill, Noble, Palmer, Roberts, Ruggles, Smith, Southard, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Walker of Alabama, and Williams of Mississippi—19.

So the Senate refused to lay the report on the table, and proceeded to consider it.

Subsequently, on motion of Mr. BARBOUR, supported by an argument on the merits of the proposition, the report was postponed to Thursday next.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to amend the charter of the Bank of the United States, the question still being on the following amendment, proposed by Mr. ROBERTS:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the bills or notes of the Offices of Discount and Deposit of the said bank, excepting those of the office in the District of Columbia, originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, shall be receivable in all payments to the United States, only in the States and Territories in which they are made payable, and in the States and Territories in which no Office of Discount and Deposit shall be established, any thing in the fourteenth section of the act incorporating the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That all notes of the denomination of five dollars, issued either by the bank or any of its Offices of Dis-

The remainder of the amendment was then also rejected.

On motion of Mr. LOWRIE, the following provision, being the last in the bill, and among the penalties for defrauding the bank, was stricken out, viz:

"And by standing in a pillory not more than three times, in open day, in some public place, during one hour at a time, which standing in a pillory, when inflicted more than once, shall be on different days."

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, as amended, and read a third time, by the following vote:

Mr. TICHENOR presented the petition of Joseph B. Stuart, late paymaster of the 29th regiment of infantry, praying that certain lots of land in Ohio may be received in discharge of a balance due by him to the United States; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom the subject was referred by a resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, reported a bill for the relief of David Cooper; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Finance, to whom the subject was referred by a resolution of the Senate of the 12th instant, reported a bill concerning vessels employed in the fisheries; it was read, and passed to a second reading.

The report of the Committee on Public Lands unfavorable to the petition of Jared E. Groce, was taken up and agreed to.

The report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, unfavorable to the petition of T. Dobson & Son, was taken up and concurred in.

The bill to extend the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia, was postponed to and made the order of the day for Thursday next.

The bill "further to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes," as amended, was taken up; and the bill having been further amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill to amend the act "to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," was read a third time, passed, and sent to the House for concurrence.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs; and it was postponed to and made the order of the day for to-morrow.

The resolution instructing the Judiciary Committee to bring in a resolution extending the laws of the United States to the State of Missouri was taken up, and then Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, the mover of it, so modified it as to include also the territory of Florida; and then the resolution was again ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motions for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to join such committee as may be appointed by the House of Representatives to wait on the President of the United States, and to notify him of his re-election to the office of President of the United States.

with the original States in all respects whatever: Provided, That the following be taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the said State is admitted into the Union, namely: that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution, submitted by the people of Missouri to the consideration of Congress, shall, as soon as the provisions of the said constitution will admit, be so modified that it shall not be applicable to any description of persons who may now be or hereafter shall become citizens of any State in this Union; and that, until so modified, no law passed in conformity thereto shall be construed to exclude any citizen of either State in this Union from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States.

After some debate, this resolution was, on the motion of Mr. EATON, seconded by Mr. VAN DYKE and Mr. SOUTHARD, postponed to and made the order of the day for to-morrow. Mr. TALBOT and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, at first opposed the postponement, but, when time was asked by members in order to examine more fully the resolution, they ceased their opposition.

WEDNESDAY, February 21.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of John B. Lemaitre, of South Carolina, merchant, praying the restitution of the amount of an export bond paid by him, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. EDWARDS presented the petition of the inhabitants of, and settlers on, the military bounty lands in the State of Illinois, praying the establishment of post offices and post routes therein; and it was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion, by Mr. SANFORD, the Committee on Finance were discharged from the consideration of the "report of the joint committee of the General Assembly of Ohio, on the subject of the suit of the Bank of the United States against the officers of the State."

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to authorize the collectors of customs to pay debentures issued on the exportation of loaf sugar, and spirits distilled from molasses," reported it without amendment.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of William Doak, made a report, accompanied by a bill giving the right of pre-emption to William Doak and Noble Osborne; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

Mr. THOMAS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Caldwell and others, purchasers of lots in Shawneetown, made a report, accompanied by a bill to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to remit the instalments due on certain lots in Shawneetown, in the State of Illinois; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to a second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Bartholomew Shaumburg, made a report accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, to appoint a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States, and to notify him of his re-election, and agreed thereto; and Messrs. BARBOUR and KING, of New York, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, requesting the President of the United States to notify the Vice President of his re-election; and agreed thereto.

Mr. TALBOT gave notice that to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a bill to extend the judicial authority of the United States over the State of Missouri.

MISSOURI.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the following resolution, offered by Mr. ROBERTS:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the State of Missouri shall be, and is hereby declared, one of the United States of America, and is admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever: Provided, That the following be taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the said State is admitted into the Union, namely: that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution submitted by the people of Missouri to the consideration of Congress, shall, as soon as the provisions of said constitution will admit, be so modified, that it shall not be applicable to any description of persons who may now be, or hereafter shall become, citizens of any State in this Union; and that, until so modified, no law, passed in conformity thereto, shall be construed to exclude any citizens of either State in this Union from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States.

Much debate took place on the merits of the resolution, as well as on the expediency of now acting on it, in the course of which Mr. BARBOUR moved to strike out the proviso, but subsequently withdrew the motion. The resolution was advocated by Messrs. ROBERTS, LOWRIE, and BARBOUR, and was opposed by Messrs. SMITH and VAN DYKE.

Mr. LOWRIE, after observing that the resolution had been brought forward by those who had opposed the former resolution of the Senate, from a sincere desire to see the State admitted, and with the view of meeting gentlemen on the other side, as far as they could; but, as the proposition appeared not to be acceptable to them, he, for one, would not press it on them, and therefore moved its indefinite postponement.

This motion was negatived—yeas 24, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dickerson, Eaton, Horsey, King of New York, Lanman, Lowrie, Macon, Mills, Noble, Otis, Sanford, Smith, Southard, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Mississippi.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Dana, Edwards, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Knight, Morril, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Roberts, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Walker of Alabama, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, made an unsuccessful motion to lay the resolution on the table, with the view of taking up the Army bill.

Mr. KING, of New York, renewed the motion previously made and withdrawn by Mr. BARBOUR, to strike from the resolution all the proviso, as follows:

“Provided, That the following be taken as fundamental conditions and terms upon which the said State is admitted into the Union, namely: that the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution, submitted by the people of Missouri to the consideration of Congress, shall, as soon as the provisions of said constitution will admit, be so modified, that it shall not impair the privileges or immunities of any description of persons who may now be, or hereafter shall become, citizens of any State in this Union; and that, until so modified, no law, passed in conformity thereto, shall be construed to exclude any citizen of either State in this Union, from the enjoyment of any of the privileges and immunities to which such citizen is entitled under the Constitution of the United States.”

The motion was decided, without debate, in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Gaillard, Holmes of Mississippi, King of Alabama, King of New York, Macon, Mills, Otis, Sanford, Smith, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Walker of Alabama, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Dana, Dickerson, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Holmes of Maine, Horsey, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Morril, Noble, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Roberts, Southard, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, and Walker of Georgia—27.

Mr. BROWN moved to amend the proviso so as to deprive it of its injunction on the State of Missouri to amend its constitution in the clause referred to, and leave it to read, that the clause “should not be so construed as to impair the privileges of citizens of other States,” &c.

Mr. ROBERTS objected to this amendment, as it would change the whole principle of the proviso, and give the resolution such a shape as would compel him to oppose it.

Mr. BROWN maintained his motion at some length. Had the resolution come from the other

House in the shape it now was, he should perhaps vote for it, for the sake of closing this long standing and disagreeable question, to accomplish which he was willing to make great sacrifices; but he was not ready to play so bold a game as to volunteer to the other House a surrender of the whole principle for which they contended; especially as the Senate had already tendered to it one proposition, which had been there rejected. A compromise to the extent the proviso went would be time enough when it came from the other House.

Mr. TALBOT conceived that the amendment proposed by Mr. BROWN would be mischievous and produce no good. On so great a subject, and to settle a question so momentous, he was willing to give up something, and hold out to the other side the hand of compromise; but it was certainly a question which every one was to settle with his own conscience.

The question being taken on Mr. BROWN’s motion, it was negatived without a division.

Mr. TRIMBLE moved to amend the proviso, by adding thereto the following clause:

And provided, also, That the 8th article of the said constitution [the article authorizing the establishment of banks] shall be annulled as soon as said constitution, in conformity with the provisions thereof, is subject to amendment.

This amendment was rejected without debate, and without division.

The question was then put on ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read the third time; and was decided by yeas and nays as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Edwards, Elliott, Holmes of Maine, Horsey, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Lowrie, Morril, Parrott, Pleasants, Roberts, Southard, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Thomas, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Dana, Dickerson, Eaton, Gaillard, Holmes of Mississippi, King of Alabama, King of New York, Knight, Lanman, Macon, Mills, Noble, Otis, Palmer, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Tichenor, Trimble, Van Dyke, Walker of Alabama, and Williams of Mississippi—24.

So the resolution was rejected.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill from the other House to reduce the Army, and the amendments proposed thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, submitted to the Senate the considerations which induced the committee to recommend the modifications which they had reported to the bill. He went into a detailed view of the subject, of the posts necessary to be maintained, the proper distribution of the forces, &c., to show that the service required the number of regiments proposed by the substitute; also to show that the staff ought to be constituted as proposed by the amendment; that the cost of the organization proposed by the substitute would be but a small sum more than that proposed by the other House; that they had varied from the bill of the other House only in features which they deemed of importance, leaving others, to some of which there was some objections, as the other House had passed them.

The principal objection which Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, had to the details of this bill, or the amendment, was the amalgamation of the ordnance corps with that of the artillery; to show the inexpediency of which, he offered a few arguments, and added some observations on the impolicy of the whole plan of reduction, to which he was opposed, conceiving it incompatible with considerations of true economy, and for which he should vote with reluctance.

Mr. TICHENOR offered his views at large on the subject of reduction, and of the modes proposed; and also submitted a number of remarks on the present organization of the Army, in its supply department particularly, to show its great and unexampled excellence, both in efficiency and economy; also, to prove the inexpediency of consolidating the ordnance and artillery corps; and in favor of leaving the system established in 1815 relative to the ordnance department untouched.

Mr. DANA objected to that clause of the amendment which proposes to merge the ordnance department in the artillery, as it proposed to abolish a separate superintendence and control of the public military property, and the responsibility which ought to attach to those officers discharging those duties, and explained his views at some length; he preferred the provision in the bill of the other House.

Mr. WALKER, of Georgia, moved to strike out the 4th section of the amendment which merges the ordnance in the artillery, giving the President power to select artillery officers to perform the present ordnance duties, giving them extra pay therefor, &c., and to insert in lieu thereof a clause to retain the ordnance corps as at present established.

Mr. TRIMBLE opposed this motion, and spoke to obviate the objections which had been urged by Messrs. DANA and WALKER against the proposed consolidation of the two corps, and referred to its operation and effect to show its expediency in the organization of our Army.

Mr. OTIS advocated the motion to amend, being always in favor of maintaining existing establishments which there were not strong and clear reasons for changing, which reasons did not exist for the present change, but on the contrary they were adverse to it; he would therefore prefer the provision of the other House in preference to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, explained the difference of cost in the two plans, showing that the mode proposed by the committee would make a saving of $82,000; that, besides this reason, the ordnance corps wanted revision, and spoke to show that the duties would be better discharged by an amalgamation; that it would practice the artillery officers in the performance of those duties, &c.

Messrs. WALKER, of Georgia, TICHENOR, and TRIMBLE, severally spoke repeatedly to enforce their views of this matter of detail.

The question being taken first on striking out the 4th section, it was negatived—yeas 18, nays 19.

The bill was then laid on the table.

THURSDAY, February 22.

Mr. WALKER, of Alabama, presented the memorial of the convention convened pursuant to the act of Congress "to enable the people of the Alabama territory to form a constitution and State government," in behalf of the people of the State of Alabama, suggesting the expediency and policy of annexing to that State so much of the country lately ceded by Spain as lies west of the Appalachicola river, and declaring their consent to such annexation; and the memorial was read, and laid on the table.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, by resolution of the 6th December, reported a bill to designate the boundaries of a land district and for the establishment of a land office in the State of Indiana; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. RUGGLES, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill supplementary to an act passed on the 5th of April, 1820, entitled "An act for the relief of John Harding, Giles Harding, John Shute, and John Nichols," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, in pursuance of a resolution of the 15th instant, reported a bill for the relief of Dean Weymouth; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SMITH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of John Slocum, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner be not granted, and that he have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Cahoon, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petition be not granted, and that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the 12th of December to inquire into the expediency of amending the judiciary laws, so as to authorize writs of error in criminal cases, reported that it is inexpedient to legislate on the subject; and the report was read.

The bill to authorize the Commissioner of the General Land Office to remit the instalments due on certain lots in Shawncetown, in the State of Illinois; and the bill giving the right of pre-emption to William Doak and Noble Osborne; were severally read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Claims on the memorial of Bartholomew Shaumburg; and in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on reducing the allowances authorized by law for the two Houses of Congress, and for the Executive Departments; and, on motion by Mr. BARBOUR, it was laid on the table.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed the bill which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Tucker, late a Captain in the Navy of the United States;" with an amendment. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to fix and equalize the pay of the officers in the Army of the United States;" a resolution providing for jails in certain cases, for the safe custody of persons committed under the authority of the United States; and a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to report the subjects proper to be acted on during the present session; in which amendment, bill, and resolutions, they request the concurrence of the Senate.

SENATE.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DICKERSON proposed to amend the said amendment by striking out of section nine, lines one, two, and three, the words "that there shall be one judge advocate with an annual salary of two thousand dollars."

Mr. DICKERSON said, if the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs, to the bill sent from the House of Representatives, proposed an equal reduction of the army with that bill, and an equal reduction of the officers of the army, he should prefer it to the bill, because it proposed some improvement in the organization of the force to be retained; but this, said he, is far from being the case. The army, as proposed by the bill, is composed of skeleton regiments, but that proposed by the amendment is a much nearer approach to an army of officers. The reduction is to fall chiefly upon the non-commissioned officers and privates. The nearest approach we can make to the bill, except in organization, the better. Retrenchment is the object, and it ought to fall in due proportion upon the most expensive part of the army. But, sir, we know that a considerable part of the Senate is opposed to any reduction of the army, and we have just heard a gentleman say, upon this floor, he would willingly vote for an indefinite postponement of the bill.

The army which it is proposed by the amendment to retain in the service, although unnecessarily large, and calculated to add to the embarrassments of our exhausted Treasury, is not such as to excite any alarm as to the liberties of our country, although history furnishes us with numerous instances of revolutions, effected by armies of no greater numbers. But, the exertions which have been made, and I fear successfully made, to produce a revolution in the public mind, upon the subject of standing armies in time of peace, I will confess, fill me with apprehension that our liberties after a war or two more are to be controlled by our standing armies. The apathy of the people upon this subject, to judge from their silence, would indicate that their former jealousies of permanently standing armies, by some strange influence, had been put to rest forever; and if so, the fundamental principles of our free Government will soon be abandoned for something more splendid. The presses, once the guardians of our liberties, are now silent upon this subject, or advocate the present establishment of the army; and not a breath is heard against it except upon the floor of Congress.

A respectable army in time of peace, by which at present we are to understand a force of about 12,664 men, is spoken of with as little concern as if such an establishment was of the essence of our Government.

Parents calculate to educate their sons to the profession of arms, as a provision for life, as they would do to the profession of medicine, law, or divinity.

Many who have provided for their sons in the army, and many who wish to provide for their sons in the army, find their minds strangely altered upon this subject; and they begin to view as chimerical and ridiculous their former fears of a military government. If we may judge of the future by the past, the standing army is to make a most rapid progress in this country. Every circumstance attending the army indicates this, but excites little apprehension in the minds of the people, who must bear the burden. In thirty years from this time an army of 50,000 men will be considered as a very moderate peace establishment.

If we succeed in reducing the army now, it will not be because it is against the genius of our Government to keep up such an establishment in time of peace, but because our revenues fail us; it will be because a resort to measures calculated to save the army, as at present established, would not be exactly calculated to save ourselves. Loans, if frequently repeated in time of peace, are pernicious and dangerous expedients. Direct taxes would lead to certain inquiries which might be extremely troublesome to us who are responsible for the expenditure of the public moneys. We shall be told, that, with a surplus of five millions in our Treasury four years ago, we have, in time of profound peace, been obliged to borrow three millions last session, and must borrow more this—for no taxes can save us from this necessity.

I should wish to see the army reduced to five thousand men in time of peace, when no enemy threatens to molest us, even if our finances were in the most prosperous train. But a reduction which principle would render proper, our empty Treasury will render necessary; and but for this necessity no reduction would take place. If our country was not in distress—if our finances were not embarrassed, the army, as at present established, would be permanently fixed upon us. No efforts of those who think such a force unnecessary for our defence, or dangerous to our liberties, would have the least avail. The peace establishment would go on to increase, but never to decrease, from this time forward.

The time was, about twenty years ago, when a certain party made prodigious clamors against standing armies in time of peace; but times have altered, and I fear we have altered with them.

For my own part, however, I like to look back to the period when our Government was first established—when its fundamental principles were more duly appreciated than they are now—when we were swayed by political maxims that had been rendered sacred by the Revolution.*

FEBRUARY, 1821.

Military Peace Establishment.

SENATE.

And if, by comparison and examination, we find that we have deviated from the courses then pursued; that we have advanced in measures then condemned as dangerous to our Government, a retrograde movement should be prescribed. An approach to first principles should be attempted. But in nothing is this more necessary than in a rigid economy in the expenditure of public moneys, and a proper and necessary jealousy to be observed towards a standing army in time of peace. These sentiments, I know, are somewhat unfashionable at present; they are considered as illiberal, contracted, calculated only for the short-sighted politicians of the early stages of our Government—not suited to the lofty and expanded views of the statesmen of the present day. But these are sentiments of which I am very tenacious. Former principles (perhaps I should say prejudices) have taken deep root in my mind. I delight in the simplicity and economy of our early establishments. And, as good old fashions sometimes revive, I cannot but hope that these discarded principles, now covered with obloquy and ridicule, may again become the favorites of those at least who cherished them twenty years ago.

Sir, the present embarrassed condition of our finances, and the general distress of our country, will produce a salutary change in the minds and views of our citizens generally, which could not have been hoped for in times of prosperity. The most beneficial effects result, not unfrequently, as well from national as individual calamity. It is the part of wisdom to profit by the lessons such times afford.

In order to form a just estimate of what may be expected from a standing army in this country, it will be well to consider what has happened in the land from which we derive our origin. Charles II., after his restoration, when he found it necessary to disband his army, retained in his service one thousand horse and four thousand foot under Monk, who had betrayed the commonwealth. This force was retained for guards and garrisons. And this was the first appearance of a regular standing army in England, under a monarchy. I do not speak of the very ingenious plans of Oliver Cromwell to fix an army on that nation.

James II. was anxious to increase his army, and in his speech to Parliament, immediately after Monmouth's rebellion, he says: "but when I reflect what an inconsiderable number of men began it, (the rebellion,) and how long they carried it on without any opposition, I hope every body will be convinced that the militia, which hath hitherto been so much depended on, is not sufficient for such occasions, and that there is nothing but a good force of well disciplined troops, in constant pay, that can defend us from such as, either at home or abroad, are disposed to disturb us!" Here we have royal doctrine, as well in favor of the army as against the militia.

This speech, says the historian, equally surprised both Houses of Parliament and the whole kingdom, when it came to be published; notwithstanding which, the Parliament enabled him to increase his army from seven thousand to fifteen thousand men; and subsequently to thirty thousand men, when his kingdom was invaded by his dear nephew and son-in-law, the Prince of Orange. His army, then, in imitation of other armies, deserted him; and, having no confidence in his subjects, he abdicated his throne.

King William, after establishing himself upon the throne, was obliged to disband his army; but he was extremely anxious to retain a large peace establishment; in this he was opposed by his own friends, the whigs, who had brought him over. And, notwithstanding he was the best monarch that nation ever imported to rule over them; notwithstanding his remonstrances and even entreaties, in favor of his army; notwithstanding the cry excited and kept up from one end of the kingdom to the other, that the church and the monarchy were in danger; the Parliament were inflexible, and obliged him to reduce his forces to ten thousand men, and subsequently to seven thousand. If I should attempt to point out the most brilliant period in the parliamentary history of Great Britain, I should select this, when the Parliament thus obliged the King to reduce his army, and, what was still more mortifying to him, to send home his favorite Dutch guards. Let it be remembered, however, that, when they thus reduced the army, they made a larger provision for the sea service; they did not consider an increased navy as at all dangerous to their liberties.

In the reign of Queen Anne, the military glory acquired by the English, reconciled them to a standing army, which was unnecessarily kept up, with all its corruptions and abuses, under the most fortunate, the most mean, and the most mercenary of mortals, the Duke of Marlborough.

During the two succeeding reigns, the constant cry of the Pope and the Pretender, seems to have deprived the people of that kingdom of their senses; and they went on from period to period to increase the army, which was to enslave them.

The circumstances which have led to a large increase of their standing army, since that period, are too familiar to need recital. It is a melancholy fact which we should constantly keep in view, that that nation which, a little more than one century ago, looked with the greatest jealousy upon a standing army of ten thousand men, now groans under the curse of a military Government.

Our progress, I fear, will be still more rapid. In the year 1790, General Knox, then the Secretary of War, made a report upon the subject of the militia, which will afford a just test of the sentiments of those who were most favorable to a standing army in time of peace at that day; for, it can hardly be supposed that General Knox, a distinguished officer of the Revolution, had not a strong partiality for the army. In this report he says:

"A small corps of well disciplined and well informed artillerists and engineers, and a legion for the protection of our frontiers, and the magazines and arsenals, are all the military which may be required for the use of the United States. The privates of the corps to be enlisted for a certain period, and, after the expiration of which, to return to the mass of citizens. An energetic national militia is to be regarded as the capital security of a free Republic, and not a standing army, forming a distinct class in the community.

"It is the introduction and diffusion of vice and corruption of manners into the mass of the people, that renders a standing army necessary. It is when public spirit is despised, and avarice, indolence, and effeminacy of manners, predominate, and prevent the establishment of institutions which would elevate the minds of the youth in the paths of virtue and honor, that a standing army is formed and rivetted forever."

This report was examined, and strongly recommended to the attention of Congress, by General Washington, then President of the United States. Eight months after this, it was enacted by Congress that the whole number of non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, to be in the service of the United States at any one time, should not exceed 1,216 men, to be raised for three years, unless sooner discharged, to be organized into one regiment of infantry, to consist of three battalions, and one battalion of artillery.

In 1802, the Peace Establishment was fixed at 3,284 officers, non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, exclusive of a few military agents.

In 1815, it was enacted by Congress, that the Peace Establishment of the United States should consist of such portions of artillery, infantry, and riflemen, not exceeding in the whole ten thousand men, as the President of the United States should judge proper, and that the corps of engineers should be retained, which consisted of 140 men, making, in the aggregate, 10,140 men; yet, such is the construction given to this law, that, by the present organization, our army amounts, in the aggregate, to 12,664.

After the next war in which we may be engaged shall be finished, I have no doubt our Peace Establishment will be fixed at 20,000 or more.

We had for the head of our first Peace Establishment a colonel; for the second, a brigadier general; for the third, two major generals and four brigadiers. If such has already been the progress of our army, what may we not expect in future?

I think, with General Knox, that an energetic national militia is to be regarded as the capital security of a free Republic. The navy has grown up to a degree of importance that could not have been anticipated thirty years ago. It is now looked upon, and justly so, as our strong defence against European enemies; and it has this important circumstance to recommend it, that it has no tendency to endanger the liberties of the country. It was the policy of the party of the De Witts, who were Republicans, to encourage the navy, but of the Orange party, to encourage the army, because, says Mr. Hume, the army were in favor of monarchy; and a large army must at all times, from its organization, be anti-republican.

The Military Academy at West Point is a valuable institution, inasmuch as it leads to a diffusion of correct military science throughout the United States, to be called into requisition whenever wanted, and thus renders it proper to reduce the standing army to a point below what it would otherwise be expedient to do. There is but one thing to be feared from this academy, which is, that it may enlist too many friends in favor of standing armies.

In time of war we must have armies sufficient for the exigencies of the war; most of the fighting should be done by regular forces; but the first onset in all our wars must be sustained by our militia, and, during the war, they must be prepared at all points to defend the country; and, in order that they may be enabled so to do, the greatest attention should be paid to their organization and discipline, which never will be the case while we rely upon a standing army.

The policy of keeping up skeleton regiments, so much reduced as to consist of no more than 440 rank and file, with a full complement of officers, will not be understood, except by gentlemen of the army. To show the propriety of reducing the army to the lowest point proposed, both as to officers and men, I will read some statements made and calculated from documents laid on our tables:

Expense of the army for pay, subsistence, forage, bounties, premiums, expenses of recruiting, hospital department, and Military Academy, for the year 1818 - - - -	$3,748,445
For the year 1819 - - - -	3,351,363
Eleven months in 1820	$2,616,526
Add for one month, estimate	218,044
	<hr/> 2,834,570
	<hr/> $9,934,378

The average of three years - - - $3,311,457

Which would give for our six years of peace, nineteen millions eight hundred and sixty-eight thousand, seven hundred and forty-two dollars. It will be observed, that this is exclusive of expenses for fortifications, and a variety of other charges attending the defence of the country by land.

Expense for transportation for officers amounted, in three years, 1816, 1817, 1818, to $92,564, and their charges for the same time, for fuel and quarters, amounted to $14,263.

For the recruiting service:

Recruits in the year 1817 - - -	3,939
" 1818 - - -	4,238
" 1819 - - -	4,304
" 1820 - - -	3,211
	<hr/> 15,692

Average of four years - - - 3,923

This would give for our six years of peace, 23,538, which, at fourteen dollars for each recruit, would amount to $315,532. So much for recruiting, besides large sums for taking up deserters, at thirty dollars a head, and for shooting deserters thirty dollars each; at least, that was the sum ordered by Colonel King to be paid to Sergeant Childress for shooting Neil Cameron, a deserter, who begged for his life, and that he might be tried by a court martial. And are the people of the United States to be taxed to keep up an army of such materials, which is crumbling away at the rate of about one-third annually? Of what use can such an army be to the country? If there were no other reason, this would be sufficient to justify a reduction of the army to the lowest point proposed. As these calculations are made from scanty materials, they may, in some instances, be above, and in some below, the truth.

Great as the disposition is to increase the body of the army, there is still a greater disposition to increase the head.

The staff of the army, as established by Congress in 1815, was not satisfactory; and, in 1816, Congress created the offices of one Adjutant and Inspector General, one Adjutant General, one Inspector General, three Topographical Engineers, and one Quartermaster General. In 1818, a bill was introduced for reducing the staff of the army; and, under that imposing name, it passed on till its last stage, when it was discovered that it increased the staff, and its title was changed to a bill regulating the staff of the army. By this reduction of the staff, we gained one Surgeon General, with a salary of two thousand five hundred dollars; but, as he is allowed, notwithstanding his being a salary officer, thirty-six dollars per month for quarters, and thirteen dollars per month for fuel, by some rule I do not understand, his allowance amounts to three thousand and eighty-eight dollars a year. And now, sir, when we are about to reduce the army, we are called upon to create a new staff officer, to be called a Judge Advocate—a bureau officer—a subordinate head of department, to be located at Washington, with a salary of two thousand dollars a year. We have now two Judge Advocates, one for the Northern, and one for the Southern division; who, for a long time past, have had nothing to do, that I can discover, but to draw their pay. They are not necessary to the service, and such must be the opinion of the Military Committee, for they have not provided for continuing them. But, if a judge advocate is not wanted where the troops are, how can he be wanted here? Is he to attend the courts martial that may take place at the Marine Barracks or Fort Warburton? Surely, he is not to be sent round to the different regiments located at separate and distant points, from the Niagara frontier to the Council Bluffs? When courts martial are detailed for the service, judge advocates may be detailed to attend the trials; and that will be done even if we have a Judge Advocate General here. The honorable chairman of the committee has been called upon to state, as far as the same may have come to his knowledge, what are to be the duties of this Judge Advocate General. He informs us that he is to keep a record of the proceedings of the courts martial to be held for the army, and to compile a system of martial law for the United States. As to the first, it is the duty of all Judge Advocates in the service of the United States, or who may be detailed to attend courts martial, to transmit all the documents, and papers, and proceedings, of the courts which they may respectively attend, to the War Department, where they are to be carefully filed and preserved, under the immediate care, I presume, of the Adjutant General, and where they are to remain as records. Surely, these papers and documents are not all to be recorded in a book; but, if they are, it can be done by a common clerk. As to compiling a system of martial law, I would not employ an officer with a permanent salary to perform such a service, even if we wanted it, but we do not; we have such a system reported to us within a few days, and laid upon our tables, chiefly copied from a former system, which was copied from one still earlier, adopted about the commencement of our Revolutionary war. A Judge Advocate General is altogether unnecessary. I will, therefore, move to strike out so much of the amendment as relates to this officer; and I hope and trust that in this solemn farce of reduction, we shall not create an officer whose services are not wanted, and whose duties no one can define.

MR. DICKERSON'S motion was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Dana, Dickerson, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Horsey, King of Alabama, Knight, Lanman, Macon, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Southard, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Walker of Alabama, and Williams of Mississippi.

NAYS—Messrs. Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Holmes of Mississippi, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, King of New York, Lowrie, Mills, Otis, Parrott, Roberts, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Tennessee.

On motion, by MR. SMITH, further to amend the said amendment, by striking out of section five, lines two and three, the words "Major General with two Aids-de-Camp, two Brigadier Generals each," and inserting Brigadier General; and also, by striking out of the third line, the words "Aids-de-Camp," and inserting Aid-de-Camp—a division of the question was called for, and the question was taken on striking out the words "Major General with two Aids-de-Camp;" and it was determined in the negative—yeas 16, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Dana, Dickerson, Gaillard, King of Alabama, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Macon, Noble, Palmer, Ruggles, Smith, Southard, Tichenor, and Van Dyke.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Eaton, Edwards, Elliott, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of New York, Mills, Otis, Parrott, Roberts, Sanford, Stokes, Talbot, Thomas, Trimble, Walker of Alabama, Walker of Georgia, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

And the question being taken on the residue of the proposed amendment to the said amendment, it was also determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 31, as follows:

And the said amendment having been further amended, it was agreed to, and the bill was reported to the House, amended accordingly; and the Senate adjourned.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22, 1821.

The Message and report were read.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Tucker, late a captain in the Navy of the United States;" and concurred therein.

The bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act to fix and equalize the pay of the officers in the Army of the United States," was twice read by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution from the House of Representatives, providing for jails in certain cases for the safe custody of persons committed under the authority of the United States, was read, and passed to a second reading.

The resolution from the House of Representatives, for the appointment of a joint committee to report the subjects proper to be acted on during the present session, was read three times by unanimous consent, and concurred in; and Messrs. SANFORD and SMITH were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States, for the year 1821;" and a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the building of lighthouses on Cross and Pond islands, in the harbor of Boothbay, and at the mouth of Oswego river, and placing buoys on the shoals of Nantucket and Vineyard Sound, near the harbor of Wickford, and on the Altamaha river, and for other purposes;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

MILITARY PEACE ESTABLISHMENT.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to reduce the Military Peace Establishment, and the substitute proposed therefor by the Military Committee of the Senate.

Mr. TICHENOR moved to strike out the 4th section of the substitute, which proposes, in substance, to merge the ordnance corps in the artillery, and giving the President authority to select artillery officers to perform the present ordnance duties, to receive extra pay therefor, and to be subject only to the orders of the Secretary of War; and to insert, in lieu of said section, another, making provision for a separate corps of ordnance.

This proposition again gave rise to a debate of more than an hour's continuance, in which Messrs. TICHENOR, WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, TRIMBLE, CHANDLER, DANA, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, took part.

In the end the amendment was negatived, without a division.

After some further motions and discussion on the minor details of the bill, Mr. SMITH moved to strike out of the 14th section of the committee's amendment that part which directs that all vacancies which may occur in the Army prior to June, 1822, "shall be filled by selection from the officers disbanded by virtue of this act, provided a sufficient number of suitable character apply for the same"—Mr. S. considering such a provision an encroachment on the unconditional right of nomination conferred on the President of the United States by the Constitution, and in effect a violation of the Constitution, as it went to take from the President the right of appointing, with the consent of the Senate, whomsoever he pleases to office.

After some discussion on the part of the mover, and Messrs. TRIMBLE, CHANDLER, WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, JOHNSON, of Louisiana, MACON, and LANMAN, in which it was urged by those in favor of the provision, that, as there would be a number of valuable officers disbanded under the act, this was only a promise on the part of Congress, the President concurring, that they should have a preference in filling future vacancies. Mr. WILLIAMS, however, consented, not deeming it material that the whole section should be stricken out, considering that the practice would be that which the provision contemplated. The debate ended in rejecting the whole section.

Mr. OTIS moved to restore the provision for a Judge Advocate, with a salary of two thousand dollars, which was yesterday stricken out in Committee of the Whole.

The proposition was earnestly opposed by Mr. DICKERSON, and also by Mr. SMITH, and was supported by Messrs. OTIS and TRIMBLE.

The motion was agreed to—yeas 20, nays 17; and the bill was then ordered to be engrossed as amended, and read a third time.

SATURDAY, February 24.

The two bills from the House of Representatives yesterday brought up for concurrence, were severally read twice by unanimous consent, and referred.

Mr. HORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill concerning divorces and alimony in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments; which were read.

Mr. HORSEY, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John Threlkeld and Joseph Brooks, reported a bill to empower the Levy Court for the county of Washington to discontinue a certain road therein mentioned; and the bill was read, and passed to a second reading.

clerks employed in their offices, and of the Librarian," approved the 18th day of April, 1818; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of modifying the laws organizing the district court of the United States for the State of Louisiana, so as to require the judge of said district to hold a court at Opelousas or at Alexandria, in the western district of the State, during the months of August and September in every year.

Mr. EATON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if any, and what, proceedings have been had in relation to any person holding an office under the authority of this Government, charged with being concerned in the introduction of any slave or slaves into the United States, contrary to existing laws upon the subject; and that he report such evidences and opinions connected therewith, not confidentially communicated to him, as may be in his possession.

On motion, by Mr. EATON, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 2d instant, relative to the claim of John H. Piatt, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill to designate the boundaries of a land district, and for the establishment of a land office in the State of Indiana; the bill for the relief of Dean Weymouth; the bill granting to the corporation of the city of Mobile, in the State of Alabama, certain lots of ground in the said city; and the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Missouri; were severally read the second time.

The Senate proceeded to consider the last mentioned bill, as in Committee of the Whole; and it was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The resolution from the House of Representatives providing for jails in certain cases for the safe custody of persons imprisoned under the authority of the United States, was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion of yesterday, for information relative to the execution or violation of the navigation laws; and agreed thereto.

The amendment to the bill, entitled "An act to reduce and fix the Military Peace Establishment of the United States," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The bill to continue the charters of certain banks in the District of Columbia was taken up, and having been amended so as to provide for the consolidation of the Bank of Alexandria and the Bank of Potomac into one bank (according to their own request) the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill providing for the adjudication and payment of claims arising under the Treaty of Amity, Settlement, and Limits, between the United States and His Catholic Majesty; and the bill was twice read by unanimous consent.

On motion by Mr. SANFORD, the Committee on Finance were discharged from the memorial of the merchants of the city of New York, which was yesterday presented to the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of State to issue a patent to Thomas Oxley," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the better regulation of the trade with the Indian tribes; and, on motion by Mr. TRIMBLE, it was postponed indefinitely.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint committee to report whether it be or not expedient to admit Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to provide for the due execution of the laws therein, and, if not, whether any other, and what, provision adapted to her actual condition ought to be made by law.

The bill to confirm the claim of the Marquis de Maison Rouge to a tract of land in Arkansas, was taken up; and after a short time spent in its consideration, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by yeas and nays—yeas 22, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Elliott, Gaillard, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, Lowrie, Mills, Otis, Pleasants, Ruggles, Sanford, Southard, Stokes, Taylor, Thomas, Trimble, Van Dyke, Walker of Alabama, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Eaton, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, King of New York, Lanman, Macon, Palmer, and Smith.

INDIAN TRADE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill further to continue in force, (until June, 1822,) the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian trades.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Ohio, opposed the bill and the present system of Indian trade, at much length; and the bill was defended by Messrs. HOLMES, of Mississippi, and JOHNSON, of Kentucky, principally on the ground that it was too late now to go into a revision of the system of Indian trade at the present session.

Mr. TRIMBLE proposed to amend the bill by adding thereto the following section:

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Superintendent of Indian trade shall not hereafter purchase any goods for the Indian Department, except for such factories as the United States are bound by treaty to continue; and that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to adopt such measures as may be necessary and proper to have the funds and the property employed in the Indian trade to be paid into the Treasury of the United States."

The amendment was negatived by yeas and nays—23 votes to 12; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Eaton, King of New York, Lanman, Macon, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Taylor, Trimble, Walker of Alabama, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Dana, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Knight, Lowrie, Mills, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Southard, Stokes, Thomas Van Dyke, and Walker of Georgia.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

MISSOURI.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, the Senate proceeded to consider the message from the House, announcing their appointment of a committee to meet such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, on the subject of the admission of Missouri into the Union; and the question was on concurring with the other House in the course proposed.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, observed, that, from the hasty glance he could give the subject, he saw no good reason for such a proceeding on the part of the Senate. There was no doubt or difficulty here on the subject of Missouri. If there was any in the other House, he had no objection to give them the advice of the Senate, if necessary, but it could be no reason for the appointment of a committee on the part of this body to consult with them. Not being able to see the expediency of the course proposed, Mr. S. moved that the message lie on the table.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, remarked that the time left to act on this matter was so short that a little delay might defeat the object. The subject was one of great importance, Mr. B. said, and he hoped the Senate would act on it immediately. The course proposed by the other House was not a novelty in the proceedings of Congress or of the English Parliament, whence most of our rules were drawn. Committees of conference were frequently appointed on subjects of much less importance than the present; and it was proper that, when the two Houses do not agree on the principles of a public act, there should be a joint committee to see if they can devise any course in which the two branches would probably meet. This was a mere proposition for such an inquiry, and he hoped the Senate would accede to it.

Mr. SMITH said he had no opportunity to see what the proposition from the other House actually was, as it had just been received, and once read. If the Senate were straitened for time, it was a reason for not acting precipitately, and the importance of the subject, which had been urged in favor of an immediate decision, was a reason for acting with caution. As to the mode of proceeding in Parliament, it did not apply to this case. If the other House had sent back the resolution of the Senate for the admission of Missouri, with an amendment, on which the two Houses could not agree, a committee of conference would be proper on the disagreeing votes; but a committee of conference to settle original principles was a novelty. He hoped, at any rate, that the Senate would allow a little time—even a half an hour—to think of this proposition.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, hoped that the message would not be laid on the table. The subject involved in it was sufficiently embarrassed and difficult already, and he should be sorry to see any additional impediments thrown in the way. It was simply a proposition from the other House for a committee of inquiry into an all-important matter; and would it, he asked, be proper for the Senate to refuse it?

The motion to lay the message on the table was negatived.

The Senate then concurred in the proposition—yeas 29, nays 7, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Chandler, Eaton, Elliott, Gaillard, Holmes of Maine, Holmes of Mississippi, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson of Kentucky, Johnson of Louisiana, King of Alabama, Knight, Lanman, Lowrie, Morrill, Palmer, Parrott, Pleasants, Roberts, Southard, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Trimble, Van Dyke, Walker of Alabama, Walker of Georgia, and Williams of Mississippi.

NAYS—Messrs. Dana, King of New York, Mills, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, and Smith.

Messrs. HOLMES, of Maine, BARBOUR, ROBERTS, MORRILL, SOUTHARD, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and KING, of New York, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

MONDAY, February 26.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

TREATY WITH SPAIN.

The Senate then went into Committee of the Whole on the bill providing for the adjudication and payment of claims arising under the treaty with Spain; and proceeded to fill the blanks therein.

In moving to fill the blank left for the compensation of the commissioners to be appointed under the act, Mr. BARBOUR said it appeared to be the common impression that men of the first standing for character and abilities ought to be selected, and to induce such men to accept the office, a liberal salary ought to be allowed. He therefore moved that the sum be fixed at three thousand dollars each; which motion was agreed to without objection. The salary for the secretary of the commissioners was fixed at two thousand dollars; and, on motion of Mr. KING, of New York, an amendment was inserted requiring that the person filling the office of secretary shall be skilled in the French and Spanish languages.

Mr. KING, of New York, deeming three thousand dollars not a sufficient salary to induce suitable persons to undertake the highly important duties devolving on the commissioners, moved to reconsider the vote on filling the blank with three thousand dollars, with the view of filling it with three thousand five hundred dollars; but the motion was negatived—ayes 12, noes 16.

The bill was then reported to the Senate, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

MARQUIS DE MAISON ROUGE.

The engrossed bill to confirm the title of the Marquis de Maison Rouge, on the application of Daniel W. Coxe, to a tract of land, (held by him under a Spanish grant, recommended by the American Commissioners to confirmation, and covering a tract of about thirty leagues square,) in Louisiana, west of the Mississippi, was read the third time.

Mr. LANMAN made an ineffectual motion to lay the bill on the table with the view of examining the claim more fully; after which a debate of considerable length took place on the merits of the title, the validity of the facts on which it rested, &c. The bill was opposed by Mr. LANMAN, and advocated by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, (on whose motion an amendment had been adopted reserving from its operation all claims which it might conflict with or affect,) OTIS, VAN DYKE, and DANA. Mr. KING, of New York, without giving any opinion on the justice of the claim, said he could not vote for the bill, for the reason that he did not conceive this to be the tribunal to decide such a question.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided by yeas and nays, in the affirmative—ayes 26, noes 8, as follows:

THURSDAY, March 1.

The credentials of JOHN HOLMES, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Maine for six years, commencing on the fourth instant, were read, and laid on file.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I herewith transmit to Congress certain extracts, and a copy of letters received by the Secretary of State from the Marshal of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, in relation to the execution of the act of the 14th of March, 1820, to provide for taking the Fourth census, together with the answers returned to that marshal by the Secretary of State. As the time within which the assistants of the marshals can legally make their returns expired on the first Monday of the present month, it would appear, by the information from the marshal at Richmond, that the completion of the Fourth census, as it respects the eastern district of Virginia, will have been defeated, not only as it regards the period contemplated by law, but during the whole of the current year, unless Congress, to whom the case is submitted, should, by an act of the present session, allow further time for making the returns in question.

As connected with this subject, it is also submitted for the consideration of Congress, how far the marshals ought to be liable to the payment of postage on the conveyance of the papers concerning the census and manufactures by the mail. In one instance it has been already ascertained that this item of contingent expense will amount to nearly a moiety of the compensation of the marshal for the whole of his services. If the marshals are to be relieved from this charge, provision will be necessary by law, either for the admission of it in their accounts, or the refunding of it by the respective postmasters.

JAMES MONROE.

Supplemental Speeches.

Mr. GAILLARD addressed the Senate as follows:

GENTLEMEN: In the approbation of my conduct as presiding officer, expressed by this honorable body, by those with whom I have been so long and so happily associated, for many of whom I entertain a warm personal attachment, and for all a sincere respect and esteem, I have received an ample and gratifying reward for the solicitude I have felt to merit their favorable opinion. If various and repeated acts of kindness; if an indulgent and liberal support in the discharge of my official duties, present claims on gratitude, then am I largely and truly your debtor; and the more especially so, when it may be emphatically added, that, whatever of public consideration I may enjoy, if indeed I possess any, has been derived more, much more, from the confidence and favor you have bestowed on me, than from any merit of my own. Under such strong obligations, obligations which will ever be recollected and acknowledged with pride and pleasure, I now tender to you gentlemen, collectively, as well as individually, my grateful thanks, wishing you a safe and happy return to your homes and families, and the enjoyment of health, happiness, and prosperity.

On motion, by Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, a committee was appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that, unless he may have other communications to make to the two Houses of Congress, they are ready to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, and Mr. HUNTER, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House, having finished the business before them, are about to adjourn.

Mr. HOLMES, of Maine, from the joint committee, reported that they had waited on the President of the United States, who informed them that he had no further communication to make to the two Houses of Congress.

Whereupon, the PRESIDENT adjourned the Senate without day.

SUPPLEMENTAL SPEECHES.

SPEECH OF MR. SMITH, OF S. C.

IN THE SENATE, JAN. 17, 1821.

On the Report of the Committee on the Petition of Matthew Lyon.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, addressed the Senate as follows:

He thought this subject had been brought before the Senate at a very unseasonable time. He likewise felt a reluctance in taking any part in the debate, and had intended to content himself with giving a silent vote when the resolutions were first submitted; but his honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) had, in a very unprovoked manner, laid him under the necessity of entering the lists in self-defence. That gentleman had told the Senate the great object of the resolutions was, to declare by a law, to be passed by the present Congress, that the act of Congress which was passed on the 14th day of July, 1798, and which expired by its own limitation on the 3d day of March, 1801, commonly called the sedition law, under which the petitioner, Matthew Lyon, and several other worthy citizens, had been at different times indicted for libels, was an unconstitutional law; and, therefore, all the fines and forfeitures which had been received in consequence of the convictions under those indictments ought to be refunded. In discussing this subject he would not attempt to follow the gentleman through all the arguments with which he had with so much eloquence entertained the Senate; because very many of them had no sort of application to the question before us. Upon an inquiry by Congress into their powers to look back upon a law which had expired twenty years ago by its own limitation, and to revive it for no other purpose but to declare that this expired law, at the time of its operation, was unconstitutional, but little aid could be derived from being told, as the gentleman had done in a strain of cloquence which no one could reach but himself, that Mathew Lyon was a very poor man, and to return him his fine of one thousand dollars would profit him, and not impoverish the United States; and that it would tend to restore his injured reputation; that he had been sent fifty miles from the place of his conviction through a populous country for the purpose of exposing him to public view; that he had been confined in a dreary dungeon, during the whole Winter months, without the privilege of fire; and denied at the same time the privilege of pen, ink, and paper, lest he should communicate his privations and his agonies to his friends. These were arguments addressed to our feelings, and not to our judgments. If Matthew Lyon has been oppressed by those who have been intrusted with the execution of this law, in the manner stated by the honorable gentleman, it would excite the utmost contempt for such unrelenting tyrants. But, he hoped, for the honor of the public officers, as well as for the honor of the citizens of the State of Vermont, and for the honor of humanity itself, that the charge was unfounded. It was substantiated by no testimony, or document of any description whatever, except the petition; and that coming from the person immediately concerned, uncorroborated by any one circumstance whatsoever, was a ground too slender to gain our credence, and he would discard it from his mind. But, if true to the full extent, as represented by the petitioner himself, it could only excite our pity and indignation, but could arm us with no power to decide, in our legislative capacity, upon the Constitutionality of a law which had been extinct for twenty years.

The gentleman from Virginia had asserted that the sedition law was unconstitutional, and that we had the power to declare it so by a law, even now. He has gone so far as to say that no other competent power exists by which a law can be declared unconstitutional.

Mr. S. observed, that what he was about to say on this question, should not be said as an advocate for the sedition law; on the contrary, he wished it to be explicitly understood that he should not speak a single word to prove it Constitutional. He would not even go into the inquiry. If a proposition was now before the Senate to re-enact that law, it would then be his duty to do so, and he would fulfil that duty. And if it would in the least degree gratify his friends, he had no hesitation in saying that he held the sedition law in as utter contempt as any man in this nation could do. Nor had he the least possible doubt but that the Federal party, which then held the reins of Government, had no other object in view when they passed this law, than that of securing their power and putting down the Republican party. However, he denied what gentlemen had said, who advocated the resolutions, that the sedition law had such an effect upon the public sentiment as to produce a revolution in the political parties, by which the Republican party got possession of the Government. The Republican party stood in need of no such aid. It was founded on correct principles, and such as could stand the test of experience and trial; and had obtained such a strong hold on the public mind, that Federalism was giving way to it, and the sedition law was passed with a hope of bolstering up the Federal cause. But, what has all this to do with the question now under consideration? The motives for passing the law, and the effect upon the public mind, could neither give to, nor take from you, the power of declaring that law unconstitutional. If you have the power, it exists independent of any such circumstances; if you have it not, no circumstances whatever can give it to you. You must derive your power from the Constitution itself; if that does not give it to you, nothing foreign can give it to you.

Mr. S. observed, that Congress had the power to pass laws, but had no power to declare such laws unconstitutional after they had passed. That function belonged exclusively to the judges. Congress could repeal any law, whilst it was in operation, but that was the only control it had over a law. As soon as a law becomes extinct, the powers of Congress to exercise a control over it become extinct also. It has been asked, if one Congress should pass an unconstitutional law, and should refuse to repeal it, as in the case of the sedition law, and the judges should pronounce it Constitutional, what course were the people to pursue to redress such a grievance? The answer is a plain one; the people have the power to hurl from their seats such perverse members who should pass an unconstitutional law, and refuse afterwards to repeal it. They have this control, and this only, over their members. Over the judges they had the power of impeachment, but no other Constitutional control. If these two departments should continue to abuse the powers in them vested, and pervert the Constitution, and bring on such oppression as could not be borne, the sovereign people would resort to first principles, and new model their Government. No human institutions were free from imperfections; no human actions exempt from error; and if one abuse had crept into your Government, and had nearly passed into oblivion, and not likely to be repeated, it was better to let it rest than to attempt to remedy it by a violent infraction of the Constitution, by assuming to yourselves the powers of reviewing the decisions of your courts of justice.

The Constitution of the United States is not the production of Congress—it is not the property of Congress. It is the production of the people, and the property of the people. It is their shield against the abuse of powers, as well as against the usurpation of powers both by Congress and the judges. Your powers are limited. All legislative powers are granted to Congress, and all judicial powers are granted to the judges. You have, therefore, the power to enact laws, but no power to sit in judgment upon those laws. It is expressly and exclusively given to the judges to construe the laws, and to decide upon their constitutionality. The judges are an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government; deriving their authority from the Constitution, and not from Congress. They are accountable to the sovereign people; and if guilty of malpractice in administering the laws, they can, and ought to be impeached; and you are the tribunal before which they are to answer; but there your powers cease. You have powers to punish judges for corruption, but none to revise and correct their decisions.

Mr. S. said, of the whole number of the Senators which he then had the honor to address, he was happy to know that three-fourths of them were, or had been practising lawyers, and the greater part of them statesmen of much experience; and, as he had once done when this question was before the Senate at a former session, he would call on gentlemen to point out that part of the Constitution which gives to Congress the power to declare a law unconstitutional, and to revoke a solemn judicial decision, made by judges constitutionally authorized, and competent to decide twenty years after the decision had had its complete operation, and twenty years after the law itself had expired by its own limitation. No gentleman would attempt it. Such a power nowhere exists—such a decision was unheard of in the annals of legislation. There was not a deliberative body in the whole civilized world that had ever claimed this right.

Mr. S. observed, that the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) had indulged in many observations upon the judges, and the conduct of the judges. In doing so he had said "Kings can do no wrong; but your judges have not that attribute—they are fallible, like other men." The gentleman then observed, that "those who had been judges themselves, would, no doubt, take part with those who had decided upon the constitutionality of the sedition law to maintain the fraternity." And, whilst the gentleman thus addressed the Senate, he, in the most significant manner, Mr. S. said, had pointed at himself, so as to leave no doubt but he was the subject of this animadversion, as he had once had the honor to hold the appointment of an associate judge in the State in which he resided. To relieve himself from the imputation, he would beg leave to compare his own course, since he had held a seat in the Senate, with that of the gentleman himself, as respected partiality for the judges. When one of the judges, from South Carolina, too, at a former session, asked to be paid a sum of money for extra services, he had himself objected to that claim, because he was of opinion it was wrong. The gentleman from Virginia voted for that claim. Three years ago the gentleman originated a bill to increase the salary of the heads of departments, and, along with them, to raise the salary of the circuit judges from $3,500 to $4,500. He opposed it himself, believing the then salary was adequate to the services; the gentleman maintained it. Finally the bill passed, and the associate judges are now on a salary of $4,500, by his exertions. Why give to the judges this increase of salary, if they are not to be confided in? And he would ask, on whose side the strongest partiality had been evinced?

As his honorable friend from North Carolina (Mr. MACON) would probably give his opinion to the Senate on this subject, Mr. S. would anticipate what he would say concerning judges. He would say that, appointing a man a judge, would by no means change his principles. If he had settled his political opinion, the appointment could not change him; if he was corrupt, he would continue corrupt. That judges were always on the side of the Administration, and dependent upon those who gave them their places, and, upon a question where the Government was concerned, they always went with the Government; and withal, that judges were no more to be trusted than other men. Mr. S. said he was willing to admit all this. He was by no means an advocate for the rights of judges beyond those of other men. Indeed he would allow more than that; judges not only had their prejudices when grand political questions agitated the public mind, but sometimes became partisans, and endeavored to influence the public sentiment. Some of the United States judges, and likewise some of the State judges, about the time this sedition law passed, and during its continuance, were in the habit of preaching political sermons in the courts of justice, in the shape of what they called a charge to the grand jury. In these charges they availed themselves of their official stations to disseminate their own political creeds. They preached much against French politics, and the danger of French influence, and against the growing democracy in our own country. He had in his library one of those political sermons, which was delivered to the grand juries by one of the associate judges of South Carolina. He kept it as a memento of the times.

Mr. S. observed, there was a story in circulation, but whether a true story he could not tell, that one of your judges had descended from his high station during the last session of Congress, and mingled in the strife; and endeavored, with no little zeal, to influence, by his arguments, both within and without the Congress, the decision of a political question to a result that would shake this Union to its centre; and, not content with this, he had likewise taken up the trade of political preaching to grand juries, upon the same subject. Although he acknowledged that a judge, who should forget that it was his duty to administer the laws, but not to make laws, and should, by his vanity or his ambition, thrust himself into this House, to whisper his political tenets into your ears, was intermeddling beyond his Constitutional sphere, and would justly incur the execrations of every independent man, yet he had still to learn, however profligate the judges might be, that Congress could assume powers not delegated by the Constitution.

His friend from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) had said, that "the judges had refused to declare this sedition law unconstitutional, and, unless Congress will do so, the Government is in danger, and it is the only means by which your Constitution can be brought back to its original purity."

Amongst many other grounds to impress a belief that the law is unconstitutional, and that you ought to declare it so, he gives us the opinions of President Madison and Chief Justice Marshall; and, the better to enforce it, tells you to look into the Journals of the Federal Convention, lately published for your use, and you will find that Mr. Madison furnished more of the materials for that Constitution than any other member of that Convention. Mr. S. said, he did not wish to take from that venerable patriot, nor from Virginia, any of their just honors, of which they were really entitled to so great a portion; nor was he willing to ask for any for the citizens of his own State, where they had no claim; but, from the Journals of that Convention, it must be acknowledged that Mr. Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, had submitted propositions upon which almost all the important provisions of the Constitution were based. This, however, had but little to do with the subject under consideration, nor would he have mentioned it but to correct what he considered a mistake in his friend from Virginia. As to the opinions of President Madison and Chief Justice Marshall, although he believed them to rank with the greatest statesmen living, nevertheless, as they were offered as authority, they, like other authorities, were subject to be examined on both sides; and, so far as regards bringing the Constitution back to its original purity, their opinions on another occasion would leave some doubt. Within three years after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, Mr. President Madison, in debate upon a proposition to incorporate the former Bank of the United States, opposed it on the ground of its being unconstitutional—he said :

“In making these remarks on the merits of the bill, he had reserved to himself the right to deny the authority of Congress to pass it. He had entertained this opinion from the date of the Constitution. His impression might perhaps be stronger, because he well recollected that a power to grant charters to incorporations had been proposed in the General Convention, and rejected.”

But, when a bill to incorporate the present Bank of the United States was submitted for his approval, and when he could have put it down forever, he found means to get over all his Constitutional scruples, and approved the act. This afforded him proper occasion to restore the Constitution. There was no overwhelming majority in Congress in its favor, and but a few sessions before it had been negatived by a majority of Congress, upon the express ground of its unconstitutionality. There was no war to impose any thing like necessity for establishing such a bank. But the era of good feelings had begun to dawn. We had never heard that the Chief Justice Marshall had said the bank was unconstitutional, but, to prove the converse, upon the question of right in the States to tax that bank, the opinion he gave must be admitted to be a very labored one, destitute of authority, and only maintained upon the ground of implication and experience.

The gentleman from Virginia had said, “that the defenders of the sedition law had found the authority for Congress to pass such a law, in that part of the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution, which provides for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasions.” Mr. SMITH said, he had adverted to this remark of the gentleman, not with a view of defending the sedition law, but to show that the gentleman had drawn from the same fruitful source himself on several occasions, and to caution the gentleman, if he wishes to bring the Constitution back to its original purity, and maintain it in that purity, to touch that 8th section with a sparing hand. In 1816 the gentleman had stood foremost with the friends of the bank. The bank sprung from the same fountain, the 8th section. The gentleman now acknowledged he had erred in that vote, but says it was a time of imperious necessity. He says, “the house was on fire, and no alternative but to extinguish it in this way.” If he meant by the house being on fire, the pressure of the war, he was mistaken. The bank charter was not granted till 1816, and peace had been proclaimed in 1815, more than a year before. This institution had sprung up in the era of good feeling too; and was now convulsing the Union. It was a brand of discord between the States and the General Government. In 1817 the road and canal mania raged. The gentleman was one of its zealous advocates, and voted for it. He had since found he was wrong, and that it was unconstitutional. The gentleman, in speaking of the sedition law springing from the 8th section, takes occasion to say, the alien law was a twin from the same mother. He could tell the gentleman that his road and canal law had descended from the 8th section also, but its mother could not be ascertained. One gentleman derived the power to Congress to make roads and canals from that clause of this 8th section which gives Congress power “to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States.” Another could see it in the clause which gives Congress the power “to regulate commerce with foreign nations.” Another, in that clause which authorizes Congress “to establish post offices and post roads;” another in that clause which authorizes Congress “to raise and support armies;” and another class could perceive it in the wisdom of the Convention. They could not believe that so wise an assemblage of men could have intended to forget making provision for improvements so desirable, although they had actually forgotten it. We could, from this diversity of opinions, perceive that the mother of this road and canal law could not be accurately traced. Nor was the father of it known, and it was of course an illegitimate.

If gentlemen wished to restore the Constitution to its original purity, and preserve it inviolate, it was not to be done by retrospective operations upon expired laws, and long past legal decisions. If you wish to preserve your Constitution pure, you must, when questions of policy of a doubtful character arise, first examine for your Constitutional powers to act upon them. If the power is not delegated, it is reserved to the States or to the people, and you can go no further. But, instead of resorting to an inquiry of this sort, the usual mode is, when a gentleman of the Senate wishes to carry a favorite point, he tells you what you have done heretofore; he gives you a precedent. These precedents are produced very often, because, gentlemen say, the object is of little importance, or their friends are concerned, and they do not like to oppose it. And he had been told, on a very important occasion, when he, Mr. S., was urging the propriety of adhering to the Constitution, that, “if the measure was unconstitutional, it was, nevertheless, safe, whilst we had it in our own hands; that we would take care not to abuse it.” So your own precedents, which you are daily accumulating, to suit the convenience of one to-day, and of another to-morrow, and your own infallibility, now seem to form the measure of your Constitutional powers. The gentleman from Virginia has not contented himself with this, but has gone to the Parliament of Great Britain for precedents, and gives you some cases of attainder. The cases referred to were cases of attainder by the Parliament itself, and not the decisions of a court of justice. There was no parallel between the Parliament of Great Britain and the Congress of the United States. The Parliament of Great Britain was omnipotent. By its fundamental principles that Parliament is a court of judicature to hear cases in the last resort; they can do any thing which the wisdom of its members may deem right. It can depose a king, or raise one to the throne; or it can change the royal descent at pleasure. The will of Parliament is the Constitution alone by which its powers are limited. It is not so in our Government. Your powers are prescribed, and you cannot act beyond that limit. Can Congress remove a Chief Magistrate at its mere will and pleasure, and place another in the chair? You have not thought so yet, perhaps, but if you are to take the Parliament of Great Britain, with all its gigantic and omnipotent powers for your guide, and conceive your powers to be equally gigantic and omnipotent, you may do so whenever you think a fit occasion presents itself. Whilst the whole civilized world is gazing upon our political course, and admiring the simplicity of our Government, not more on account of the powers retained by the people and by the States, than for the well defined and precise limits that are prescribed to the powers given to each branch of the Government, we are looking for foreign precedents to authorize us to go beyond our limits, and lay hold on powers not delegated by the Constitution.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) had declared, "it was against the theory of our institutions to control the liberty of the press by tolerating a prosecution for a libel, even in a State." And then, the gentleman avows, "it is a business between individuals only."

Mr. S. observed, although the people of the United States, for wise purposes, may have denied this power to the General Government, and probably it was wise to do so, yet the gentleman had most egregiously mistaken the powers as well as the practice of the States to carry on prosecutions for libels. The English common law of libels was said to have originated in the Star Chamber, in the times of high-handed political oppression. But it became a part of the common law, and was transferred to this country, and adopted by all the old States, some of which still retain it, and others have ameliorated by it, their constitutions or by statute. There was not a State in the Union, either old or new, where a prosecution for libels was not authorized, either by the common law, by statute, or by the State constitution. In the States of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Vermont, Georgia, and New York, the common law had been relaxed by statute so far as to allow the defendant to give the truth in evidence. But these States still retain the common law punishment of fine, imprisonment, pillory, and whipping, at the discretion of the judge who shall pass the sentence upon conviction.

Virginia itself retained the common law, but by a forced construction suffered the truth to be given in evidence, and punished by the common law rule of fine, imprisonment, pillory, and whipping, if the judge should so order. All these States which have noticed the subject at all, have protected the liberty of the press. Virginia had been silent on that important privilege in her constitution. Maryland had adopted the common law, and punished and prosecuted according to its rules.

The State of North Carolina had formed for herself, immediately after the declaration of independence, perhaps the best constitution of any State in the Union. In that constitution the liberty of the press was better protected than in any other State. Its language is stronger and more explicit. It is in these words: "That the freedom of the press is one of the great bulwarks of liberty, and, therefore, ought never to be restrained." Notwithstanding this, the common law of libels is in full force in that State. And it would appear as if it was universally approved; and, as his authority for believing so, he read from the Richmond Enquirer the following passage: "The House of Commons of North Carolina has unanimously directed that prosecution be commenced against John Wright, (formerly of this town,) printer and proprietor of the Halifax Compiler, for a libellous publication contained in a late number of that paper against the Legislature of North Carolina." This appears to have been at the last session of that Legislature. From this course of proceeding, by that respectable body, it would seem, whatever protection the constitution of that State had given to the liberty of the press, it was not intended to give protection to the publication of libels, or this prosecution could not have been ordered.

The State of South Carolina has said, in the 6th section of the 9th article of her constitution, "the trial by jury, &c., and the liberty of the press, shall be forever inviolably preserved." Yet, in that State, the common law is in full force, with all its absurdities, that the truth cannot be given in evidence, "the greater the truth, the greater the libel," &c.; and, not only in force, but in constant practice; and, what is more, it is likely to remain in force. Two years ago, a bill was brought before the Legislature of that State to relax the common law, so far as to authorize the defendant to give truth in evidence on the trial; and this bill was supported by unrivalled eloquence, and yet it was negatived by a large majority.

The State of Connecticut has said, in the 5th section of the 1st article of her declaration of rights, "every citizen may freely speak, write, and publish, his sentiments on all subjects, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty."

The States of Pennsylvania and Delaware both declare in their constitutions, that the press shall be free to every citizen to write and print what he pleases, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty; but do not authorize the truth to be given in evidence, except in cases for prosecutions for publications of papers investigating the official conduct of public officers.

The States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Ohio, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, and Maine, have all declared by their constitutions that the presses shall be free, and every citizen may freely write, speak, and print, on any subject, being responsible for the abuse of that liberty. Some of those States have authorized the defendant to give the truth in evidence in a prosecution for the publication of papers examining the proceedings of the Legislature, or the official conduct of public officers; but others do not go so far. And all the constitutions of those States of Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, and Maine, have been within your control, and all but two or three of them have actually passed under your revision, and not a single objection offered to one of them. Five or six of these very exceptionable constitutions had passed under the inspection of the gentleman from Virginia; and the mildest feature any of them presented was, that the truth might be given in evidence on a prosecution for a libel, and yet he supposes a prosecution cannot be maintained under the authority of any of the States.

His very worthy friend from Kentucky (Mr. JOHNSON) had enumerated many offences committed by the Federal party in the course of the late war, such as impeding the enlistment of soldiers, saying the President of the United States ought to be hanged, or that he ought to be removed to make way for some other who knew the interests of the people, and would administer the Government for the public good; that it was a war dictated by the Emperor of France, and carried on for his aggrandizement, &c. He says all these impediments, and may others, for the purpose of favoring the enemy, were carried on, yet your war succeeded; and asks what would you do with such persons as those? And then replies, that he had forgiven them; and the country had forgiven them; and it was much better than to punish them. Mr. S. said he knew the goodness of that gentleman's heart would almost overcome public justice itself, to embrace an opportunity to indulge his native benignity. But, were he to answer the gentleman's question, "what would you do with such persons as those?" he would answer, without any impassioned feelings, or any desire or wish whatever to offend, that he would have hanged them; because, by doing so, he would have terminated the war at a much earlier period, and have saved the lives of many valuable citizens of the United States, and prevented the effusion of much blood.

Gentlemen have said much about the liberty of the press; that it was the scourge of tyrants, and the bulwark of our civil liberty, as well as of our holy religion. Mr. S. observed, that he had said nothing in opposition to the liberty of the press. He was as friendly to the liberty of the press as any gentleman who had favored the resolutions before the Senate. He hoped the liberty of the press would always be protected, both by the Constitution and by the public sentiment. But, whilst he entertained this hope, he could not, for a moment, believe that the public sentiment of the American people would protect the propagation of falsehood, by any means, in any shape, or for any purpose. He knew much had been done for the cause of civil liberty, and of religion, since the art of printing had been discovered; but it was by the means of works of religion, of science, and of philosophy, which it had given to the world, and by which the mind of man had been enlightened and expanded. It was this which had paved the way to civil liberty; it was this which had subverted the despotisms that prevailed in the dark ages of antiquity; and it was this alone which had given freedom to the civilized world. In this great work, it was not your newspaper presses that were useful; tyrants could wield these as well as the friends of liberty. Nor was it the indiscriminate publication of truth and falsehood, for which gentlemen so much contended, that ever aided the cause of freedom. It is impossible to admit that the well-earned reputation of any citizen, whether he be a President, a member of Congress, or a private citizen, should be suffered to be assailed by falsehood, and that the spoiler should plead the liberty of the press to cover his malignity. Should this principle succeed, an honest reputation would be but a name, and the cut-throat and philanthropist would have equal claims upon your patronage and protection.

In these United States, there are about four hundred newspaper presses. There is, perhaps, amongst them, about one-tenth part that are impartial, and would do equal justice to both sides of any political question, and perhaps to the political character of public men. The rest are ready for any thing that may promote their own emolument, and serve themselves and their friends. Some of them have been ready for the highest bidder. They have become the channels through which themselves and friends are to glide into office. An office-hunter has nothing to do but enclose a fifty dollar bill to the editor, and he becomes pre-eminently qualified to fill the first office in the State, or the nation, without perhaps a single qualification for either, unless it is his talents for intrigue, for which there is now so large a demand in our country. If an editor cannot obtain sufficient supplies of slander from his customers, to keep the community in an uproar, he will supply the deficiency by his editorial remarks. If a single word is uttered which an editor supposes to be aimed at him, however true it may be, he then considers himself at liberty to name the rash offender, and to make his own press the vehicle through which he may vent his malignity and defamation. He considers this the rod of terror, by which he can awe into obedience any who should dare to call in question his conduct. Some of them have the vanity to believe they can write a man into power, and then write him out again; some make it a matter of conscience to go with the party in power; others take part with the party in power as long as they see any hope to share in the public favors; but, if the prospects darken, they become the bitter enemies of those they supposed they had put into power, and endeavor to change the dynasty, in hope of a better fortune for themselves under the new order of things. Some cannot subsist without falsehood: it is the food that nourishes and gives life to their presses. During the late war, many of your presses were kept up for the sole purpose of distracting your councils, and aiding your enemies; and protracted your war, and did you more essential injury than the enemy. These presses, instead of being the guides to the true character of political men, have become the sordid channels of intrigue, in which every scribbler can puff his patron, whether he has merit or not, provided he has secured the affections of the editor. This is so truly the character of many of your newspapers, that little or no credit is given to any thing they detail, even if it be the truth. Yet these are the presses which gentlemen consider to be the ark of your political safety, and the shield to your holy religion.

We are told that the voice of the people of this nation had passed judgment upon this law, and now demanded at your hands that you declare it unconstitutional. We are also cautioned to beware how we oppose public opinion. Mr. S. said, no gentleman had more respect for public opinion than he had, or would yield with more obedience to its mandate, whenever it was his duty, or became respectful for him to do so; but, in forming an opinion upon a Constitutional question, the Constitution itself should be his guide, not public opinion. The people whom he had the honor to represent were a magnanimous people, and intended him to form his own opinion upon Constitutional law, or they ought not, as they would not, have sent him here.

Gentlemen speak of party, and have denounced those who oppose the resolutions as apostates from the republican cause. Mr. S. observed, that apostacy could not be ascribed to himself, for he had enlisted under no party banner. Nor was he emulous to belong to any party, if he must sacrifice his honest opinion as the price of such a privilege.

The judges are said to be tyrants, and, if not controlled, may demolish your Government. Your judges may become ambitions of power, and aspire after dominion, but it is not in the nature of their avocations that they should obtain that sort of influence in the Government, which could render them dangerous to its peace. There is not an instance recorded in history of the common law judges having subverted the liberties of a nation. Whenever the civil liberties of this nation are destroyed, it must be by one of the other departments; and, if the opinion of Congress is to be the standard of right, instead of the Constitution of your country, it may unfortunately fall there. If Congress is not bound by the Constitution, it is under the control of no law but the law of opinion, which is the law of tyrants. Your judges may err, and very often do; sometimes from a want of capacity, sometimes from corruption, and sometimes from interest; but they are circumscribed by law, and subject to its penalties. If it is too difficult to reach them by impeachment, change your Constitution. It would be better for the nation that the judges should be subject to the control of one-third of the Senate, upon a case of impeachment, than that Congress should assume the power of revising their decisions. If you can organize yourselves into a high court of appeal, upon no other authority than that justice cannot be done without your interference, there can be no limits to your usurpation. The pure ermine may be stained; your judges may become corrupt; but these are evils against which the Government can protect itself. A well-regulated judiciary, with the right of trial by a jury, is the great palladium of civil liberty; it will hover round the temple of justice after it shall have forsaken these walls.

SPEECH OF MR. TALBOT, OF KENTUCKY

IN THE SENATE, JANUARY 17, 1821.

On the report of the Committee on the petition of Matthew Lyon.

MR. TALBOT, of Kentucky, addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. Chairman, it is with some hesitation I rise to address this honorable body, on the present important subject of their deliberations; a subject which involves in its decision questions of the highest moment; of Constitutional principles and constructions; of the character and merits of a former, as well as of the present, administration of our Government, as well as considerations of justice, as applied to the claim of the petitioner, who has appealed to the justice and liberality of his country for redress. I have waited long, during the protracted discussion of these various topics, with much anxiety and some impatience, to hear from some gentleman qualified for such a task, a development of the causes, either in the peculiar condition of the country; the sentiments, feelings, or opinions of the people; the dangers to which the Government may have been exposed, either from external or domestic enemies; or the actual state of parties at this important and alarming crisis, we are to ascribe this extraordinary act of national legislation. I have waited for this information with more anxiety, from the consideration that we are fortunately honored with the presence of more than one gentleman, who, as members of the Senate, are now in their seats on this floor, who were also members of the National Councils at the enactment of the sedition law; but a development of the policy, scope, and object, of the extraordinary act, the cause of so much terror and alarm, and the instrument of so much oppression and injustice, was most emphatically to have been expected from an honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. ORIS) who, if my recollection of the history of the times does not deceive me, not only gave his voice in favor of the passage, but, as a warm and able advocate, most signally contributed to the success of this obnoxious measure. But my expectations have been in vain. A silence the most profound, a discretion the most circumspect and refined, has kept the friends and advocates of this measure mute. In vain has this sedition act been denounced by my honorable friend from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) as an usurpation on the Constitution; as oppressive, tyrannical, and unjust. This denunciation, Mr. Chairman, I take the liberty to repeat—declaring it as my most sincere conviction, that the sedition act is not only, in its principle and enactments, without warrant or authority to be deduced from the Constitution of the United States, amongst the defined and enumerated powers there contained; nor is such authority to be deduced by any fair rule of argument or construction, as the execution of a power conferred on the Congress of the United States, as subsidiary to the powers expressly delegated; and I challenge honorable gentlemen who are the advocates or apologists for this measure, to point out, to put their finger on the clause or section of the Constitution, which confers such power, or from which it can be rationally, or even plausibly, inferred. If this be true, and I have a right to assume it, no honorable gentleman opposed to the resolution on your table, though repeatedly called on to do so, having come forward to controvert it, need I even advert to that article in the amendments to the Federal Constitution, emphatically called the Bill of Rights, (amendments, dictated by the cautious and jealous spirit of liberty, the watchful guardian of the people's rights,) which contains an inhibition, positive and express, to the Congress of the United States, to enact any law "concerning an establishment of religion, or abridging the freedom of the press."

The general frame and scope, as well as the subject and intent, of our national compact, the Constitution of the United States, affords no argument, or even countenance, for such a course of legislation; the whole frame and organization of the Federal Constitution, in the power delegated to the National Government, embracing only objects of national concern, connected with the national defence, and such as are placed beyond the scope and limits of the powers belonging to the individual States, to which was intended to be left the exercise of all the sovereign powers connected with internal government and municipal regulation. In illustration of this view, it is to be remarked, that the Constitution of the United States has, in no part of that instrument, vested Congress with the power to enact a criminal code for the restraint and punishment of crimes within the limits of the respective States. The absurdity, as well as dangerous consequences, of conferring such power, is obvious, and must obtrude itself on the mind of every man. That this power belongs to the sovereignty of the individual States, will not be controverted. A power in the National Government, to be exercised over the same subject, operating on each and every citizen in the United States, to be exercised simultaneously by each of these sovereign powers, by prosecutions and convictions in their respective courts, would produce a conflict of jurisdictions and of powers, which must hasten, by rapid strides, to a dissolution of that Government, which could not long endure.

But no warrant is to be found in the Constitution of the United States for a construction which would lead to consequences so disastrous. The power in Congress to enact a criminal code for the government of the citizens of the several States is repelled by every view which can be taken of its principles and provisions. Why did the framers of this sacred instrument, this charter of our rights and liberties, employ an entire section of the Constitution in defining treason against the United States, and prescribing what should be the limits of the punishment to be inflicted on the culprit? The answer is obvious: this crime being committed against the nation, and not against a State, the authority of the nation is alone concerned in, and competent to, its punishment; and besides, not only the peace and happiness, but the very existence of the nation essentially depend on the possession and exercise of such a power. Why has the Constitution of the United States, after delegating, in the most explicit and ample terms, to Congress, power over the currency and coins of the United States, in the very next and succeeding paragraph, conferred the additional, and therefore not merely an incidental power, of providing for the punishment of those who should be guilty of counterfeiting such currency or coin? Can we deem so irreverently of the wisdom of the framers of this glorious instrument, as for a moment to indulge the supposition, that they would have taken the pains, by an express provision, to delegate the power to provide for the punishment of the crime alluded to, if they had contemplated, by any other provision in the Constitution, either to confer a general power to provide for the punishment of crimes, the perpetration of which might be deemed to affect the prosperity of the nation, or the quiet and tranquil operation of the General Government? Yet such is the supposition on which arguments must be based which are employed to vindicate the power of Congress to punish political libels by the enactment of sedition laws, to be enforced by the powers and intervention of a Federal judiciary. But when it must be conceded by the advocates of this sedition act, that there is no express power to be found in the Constitution for its enactment; that, if it can be claimed at all, it must be supported on the ground that it is amongst the subsidiary powers necessary and proper for the execution of expressly delegated powers, when it is answered that no such expressly delegated power has or can be shown to which this power of enchainning the freedom of the press, and closing up the avenues to a full and free investigation of the characters and measures of public men, who are the delegates and servants of the people, as necessary and proper. When it is further answered, that the amendment to the Constitution, inhibiting all abridgment of the freedom of the press; an amendment dictated by the jealous and watchful caution of the Legislatures of the States, by which it was recommended; a jealousy springing from a deep sense of the value of the liberties intended to be secured and justified by the histories of all Governments and nations of the earth. That this amendment ought to put to silence all arguments derived from vague and general speculations in relation to the power with which Governments ought to be endowed for the preservation of those called on by the people to administer it, from the licentious tongues or pens of malicious libellers or calumniators.

But it is not on the silence of the Constitution, or the absence of delegated power to form that instrument; nor only on the amendment to that Constitution, so emphatic in its terms, that the opponents to the sedition law need rest their opposition. But, in illustration of the wisdom of its framers, understood and interpreted as we expound it, the opinion which I entertain, and avow with pride and pleasure, is, that this, and all other sedition or libel laws, having for their design and purposes the control of free and full investigation of the character and opinions of public men and public measures, without limit and without restraint, I mean from criminal prosecution, are hostile, in their very essence and principle, to liberty, and to the free and republican institutions under which we live, and which are so justly our pride and boast; for the private or individual injury, resulting from the publication of libels or malicious slanders, the incumbent of office, the representative of the people in the Congress of the United States, even their Chief Magistrate, has, by the municipal regulations, the laws of every State, his appropriate remedy, to demand and receive, in common with the lowest and meanest citizen, an equivalent for the injury he has sustained. And why is he who has been selected from amongst his fellow-citizens, to exercise, for their benefit and advantage, a little brief authority, to be hedged around with the ramparts of sovereign power, to be armed with the artillery of a criminal code, for the protection of his person or reputation, which is denied to every other citizen?

My honorable friend from Georgia has disclaimed, in pathetic strains, and my honorable friend, who sits before me, (Mr. SMITH,) has indulged in terms and anecdotes, humorous and sportive, against the slander and calumny, which flow from the licentiousness of the press. Have my honorable friends omitted to remark what is of such familiar observation in all the walks of human life, how few, if any, of the benefits of Heaven are granted us by the all-wise Disposer of Events without alloy? How liable are our greatest blessings to abuse? And that the question in the case we are now discussing is, whether the liberty of the press is not one of those political blessings inestimable in itself, the abuse of which is inseparable from its advantageous use? If gentlemen still doubt on this question, let me refer my honorable friends to the history of the late trials and prosecutions for libels in England, as well as in Ireland, for the last hundred years. What heart endowed with the common feelings of sympathy, not steeled against every soft emotion of our nature, can forbear to feel for them? Humanity herself must weep over the helpless fate of philosophers, statesmen, and patriots, the victims to the love of liberty and their country's rights, who have been offered up on the altar of their country, to the corruption, tyranny, and usurpations of power; and all under the specious pretence of punishing the licentiousness of the press; yet England boasts (how vain the boast!) that she enjoys the liberty of the press.

Believe me, Mr. Chairman, that neither the liberties of the people, nor the inestimable institutions of our free republican Government, can be preserved in their purity, while the freedom of unrestrained investigation of the character, conduct, principles, and motives of public men, or the tendency of public measures, shall be restrained and fettered by restrictions on the press; and that such investigations will never be free or useful while restrained by the perpetual terrors and actual dangers of criminal prosecutions. And I put to my honorable friends from Georgia and South Carolina, to say what legislator, jurist, or ingenious casuist, has yet been able to draw a precise line of demarcation between the liberty and licentiousness of the press, in case of political libels? In cases where party meets party in hot contention on questions of political opinions and public measures? What usurping or tyrant legislator, like the tyrant Dane, has dared to say to the political writer, investigating the opinions and motives as well as actions of the ruler of the country—thus far shalt thou go, and no farther, and here shall the proud wave of popular discontent be stayed? While therefore, Mr. Chairman, I reciprocate in the warmest terms the sentiments of indignation which my honorable friend from Georgia so forcibly and eloquently expressed against the guilt, as well as infamy, of those concerned either in the fabrication or propagation of malicious slanders—a vice, the prevalence of which is so much to be deplored, but a vice too firmly ingrafted in our frail imperfect natures—by the indulgence of which the peace and happiness of society has been so often disturbed and blasted; yet I for one must be permitted to indulge the consolatory hope, if not the fond belief, that there is in truth, integrity, and conscious worth, a charm sufficient of itself to insure the triumph of virtue; and that, armed with these, the utmost rage of malice may be defied, and that, although the excellence of such a character may, for a time, be sullied, yet, like the luminary in the heavens, which shines with light and glory on our sphere, which suffers a transient obscuration from the passing clouds, it is only permitted, that it may, when the transient vapor is passed, give fresh lustre to his beams.

But, Mr. Chairman, having detained you much longer than I intended on that branch of the discussion from which our opponents have retreated, and as the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts has declined the task for which the conspicuous part he took at the period of the enactment of this too famous law, so well qualified him, permit me to fill the chasm left by his omission in the history of the Administration at this eventful period—not from observation of the passing scene, or entirely from the documents of authentic history of the times; but in part from the contemporaneous impressions and opinions ratified and sanctioned by the public voice.

From these sources, the best which I have been enabled to procure, I feel myself authorized to infer that this sedition act was one of the last links in the chain of measures adopted and pursued by that party in whose hands the administration of the Government was then reposed, measures of a tone and character to arouse, and which had aroused strong alarms in the bosoms of the American people, for those liberties on which repeated and successive invasions had been made. These alarms, first producing expressions of discontent, had gradually increased and swelled into loud and clamorous expressions of indignation, which were echoed from one extremity of the Union to the other. It was to silence the voice of just censure, of awakened and indignant discontent—to stifle the public voice—to throw around them a rampart of defence against the assault of popular indignation. That it was the last desperate recourse of a falling party tottering on the brink of the precipice, over which this measure, intended for their preservation, as full of rashness as of danger, only served the sooner to precipitate them—and to this cause are we to ascribe the revolution of power from the hands of those who, by this measure, hoped to have secured the means of its perpetuation.

A new and extraordinary feature in this law was the short period of its duration. Other portions of your criminal code, Mr. Chairman, enacted for the prevention or punishment of offences, are, as it seems they should always be, calculated for all times and all circumstances.

But this is one among the few which have met my observation, which was for the short and limited duration of two years and a half, and by its limitation was to expire with the term of service of the then President of the United States. On that day, by a happy change, Mr. Jefferson by the voice of his country, was called to preside over its destinies. The commencement of this new and happy era furnished an illustrious proof to an admiring world of the futility and folly of sedition and libel laws. The inaugural speech of this enlightened statesman asserted the true and genuine principles of liberty, and of our free republican institutions; and established the dominion of integrity, truth, and honor, over the demons of error, falsehood, and malice. It claimed no exemption of rulers, magistrates, and representatives; their motives, designs, or measures, from the rigid strictures, from the free and unrestrained investigations of the press.

He demanded no libel or sedition act to shield the purity of his motives, the integrity of his character, from the assaults of a virulent and implacable, though fallen party. But, armed with the conscious integrity of his own heart, with this immortal ægis, stronger than adamant or brass, this illustrious philosopher and enlightened statesman reared his head above the stormy clouds of faction, intrigue, and passion; and the envenomed shafts of calumny fell harmless at his feet.

But our opponents, Mr. Chairman, not choosing to encounter this question by arguments in support either of the constitutionality or expediency of the sedition act; not willing to encounter the general sentiments of reprobation with which this obnoxious measure is now held and viewed in these United States; and entertaining, as I fondly trust my honorable friends from Georgia and South Carolina do, the same opinions with myself in relation thereto; they have taken shelter behind the bench of judges; contending that the Constitution is a government of checks and balances; that, by this theory, the judiciary of the United States is the efficient check on the usurpation of Congress, in the enactment of laws, not warranted by the Constitution; and that, when this department has interposed the sanction in the exposition or execution of a law, that no other department of our Government have a right to interfere. And that, as the law in question, during its existence, was enforced by the judicial power and is now expired, that Congress have no Constitutional right to interfere. These doctrines are beautiful in theory, and the arguments deduced therefrom are plausible and ingenious. They are such as caught my youthful mind as sterling political orthodoxy, but which recent events in the history of our country have taught me to receive with caution and distrust; as subject to many limitations; and as entirely inapplicable to the questions we are now called upon to decide.

But, before I proceed to their refutation, permit me, Mr. Chairman to premise that there is no honorable gentleman on this floor who can entertain a higher reverence for the judicial character than myself, believing as I do, that there is no station in the social body requiring for the discharge of its arduous duties more exalted qualities of mind and heart; and, next to the ministers of our holy religion, they have my esteem and veneration—sentiments which I have cherished during an intercourse of more than twenty years, during which, my professional pursuits have produced an almost daily intercourse with gentlemen who have filled the bench with honor and integrity. But, entertaining these sentiments, as I sincerely do, I cannot forget that judges are at best but men, partaking, in common with us all, the frailties, passions, and imperfections, incident to our nature. That, like us, they are what nature, education, habit, and particular modes of life, have made them. I must be permitted to express my own opinion with much humility indeed, that the judiciary of the United States is not the only depository of the Constitution of the United States, and of the rights and liberties of its citizens; the only expositors in the last resort of the Constitution and laws of the different States as regards the delicate and important questions which have occurred, and will again occur, from the conflicting claims of national and State sovereignties. Much as these conflicts are to be deprecated, they must occur, and whenever they do occur, believe me, Mr. Chairman, I speak it in no spirit of evil augury or melancholy foreboding, but from my limited observations on men and events which have passed before me, or are to be found recorded on the page of history, you will find the opinions of your judiciary arrayed on the side of that power from which they have derived their honors and emoluments, and so of our State judiciaries too. It is human nature, which in spite of the utmost efforts of the virtuous and the wise, will bend the human mind, unconscious of the bias, to the dominion of her imperious sway.

But, admitting the truth of this doctrine of the Constitutional power, as well as of the efficiency of the judicial power to check the usurpations of the Congress of the United States, in its utmost latitude, it is entirely inapplicable to the present case. What is the complaint of the petitioner before you? What the argument of the advocates of the proposition on your table? Is it that the judicial power interposed a check improperly; that, without Constitutional authority it interposed its power to shield the citizen, to protect the liberties of the country from legislative usurpation? No, sir; directly the reverse. As far as complaint or imputation is directed towards the judges, it rests upon the charge, not that they did, but that they did not, interfere to arrest the career of legislative usurpation in the enactment of unconstitutional laws. It is, Mr. Chairman, when the firm, virtuous, and upright judge, strong in the integrity of his heart and the dignity of the station assigned him by his country, who, when the tempest of frenzied and infuriated party spirit rages round our happy land, like the tall and majestic oak, rears his head and hears the storm of angry passions beat in vain against its side; and not the supple, obliged, and obliging friend of a party from whom he derives his undeserved honors, like the gentle ozier plant, nods and bends his head at every gale that blows, that this salutary judicial check is to be ascribed.

What, then, is the state of fact, in relation to the application of this salutary judicial check, in the trial of Matthew Lyon? Why simply this. That one of the five judges who formed the bench of the Supreme Court of the United States, without the aid, and probably without a previous consultation with his associate judges, presided at this trial in the circuit of Vermont. That an indictment on the sedition act against Matthew Lyon, was framed by the attorney for the district; on which the culprit was arraigned; to which he pleaded not guilty; upon which a jury, impanelled by a marshal holding his office at the pleasure of the President of the United States, returned their verdict of "guilty" against the prisoner; on which the judge presiding pronounced his sentence, condemning the prisoner to an imprisonment of four months; the payment of a fine of one thousand dollars, and to be imprisoned until the fine was paid. Now, I put it distinctly to my honorable friend from Georgia, from this brief narrative of the trial, to inform the Senate in what part of the transactions attending this trial does he find the materials of which to erect the defences by which the opponents to the proposition on your table are to shelter and protect themselves from the investigation in which we have challenged them to enter. The constitutionality of the sedition law. Are they to be found in any check interposed by the judiciary, to the execution of what we pronounce an unconstitutional act?

Has there been any decision by the highest judicial power of the United States, the Supreme Court of the nation? Was the constitutionality of the law in question raised, discussed, or decided on, by the judge who presided at the trial? Or was it even a subject of deliberation in the judge's mind? To all these interrogatories, as far as we are informed by evidence, either recorded or traditional, we must answer in the negative. On what, then, I ask emphatically, is the argument predicated, that this law, having received the judicial sanction, that Congress are thereby precluded from a solemn decision on the question?

If, indeed, Mr. Chairman, after having invested your judges with their ermine, (spotless, if you please,) with their silk or satin gowns, you could place in their hands the magician's wand, with the powers of necromantic change, then, indeed, might its potent touch convert the sedition act, before unconstitutional, and a violation of the sacred charter of our rights, into a Constitutional law, free from blemish and from stain. But, until some such magic power is conferred on, or to be assigned to, judges, it is, I must confess, beyond the reach of my comprehension to perceive how the simple facts attending the indictment and trial of Matthew Lyon can confer on this act the character of Constitutional, which it never had before.

But there is another view of the subject, Mr. Chairman, which is, if possible, more conclusive than that which has been just pointed out to the consideration of the Senate, to show the entire inefficiency of the supposed sanction of the Federal judiciary, to confer on this act, otherwise unconstitutional, the attributes of a Constitutional law. My honorable friends from Georgia and South Carolina, as members, and honorable and distinguished members of a profession, whose study as well as daily occupation are, or have been, the municipal laws, and who must be familiar with the principles of that law which concern the jurisdiction of the courts appointed for its administration, must concede at once what it seems impossible to deny, that if the sedition law had never been enacted, that the Federal courts would have had no power or jurisdiction in the case of Matthew Lyon, to have received an indictment, caused an arraignment of the prisoner, a trial and conviction to be had, followed by a sentence of condemnation, all under the sedition act, on which the indictment is framed. If, then, this law is admitted by our opponents to be unconstitutional, as, by retreating from the discussion of that question, they are bound to do, what is the conclusion? Irresistible as fate, from this admission, that the sedition act being unconstitutional, was, for that cause, void in its inception, and that, being a perfect nullity, it could confer no power or jurisdiction on the courts of the United States to take cognizance of the case. And that the whole of the proceedings of the circuit court for Vermont, in relation to the arraignment, indictment, trial, and condemnation, of the prisoner, were, in the technical language of the law, coram non judice, and therefore void, and that, consequently, the trial of Matthew Lyon, though accompanied with the usual ceremonies, and clothed with all the solemn forms of law, was, in truth, but a solemn farce, not only without the solemn sanctions of the law, but in positive violation of the inhibitions of the Magna Charta of our liberties—the Constitution of the United States.

But it is contended by our opponents on this occasion, that the act in question having long since expired by its own limitation, that Congress is not authorized by the Constitution of the United States to restore to those from whom were exacted fines, exacted under judicial decisions of the courts of the United States while the act remained in force.

This argument seems to be susceptible of an easy and conclusive answer. If Congress possess the power to repeal an unconstitutional act of their predecessors, on the ground merely that it is unwarranted by the Constitution, which is virtually a declaration that such act was never Constitutionally the law of the land, on what principle shall we deny to them the power of declaring null and void the judicial proceedings of the courts of the United States, the only warrant and commission for which proceedings is this unconstitutional law? If the Sedition act had not expired, Congress would be competent to its repeal, which would be but tantamount to a declaration of its original nullity, on account of the Constitutional inhibition of its enactment. By force of what argument, or on what principle can we refuse to Congress the power to declare the original nullity of that which is extinct by lapse of time, and of restoring to injured individuals money or rights of which they have been illegally deprived by the mistaken application and operation of the act?

Happily for this country, neither the tyranny of power, or the corruption of the Legislature, or the intemperance and fury of party spirit, have, during the short period of the existence of our liberties, yet furnished examples for the illustration of this argument. The Sedition act, the subject of this debate, is the first of the bitter fruits of the exasperated fury of party spirit, with the taste of which its authors themselves were soon sated, and from which the people turned at once with loathing and disgust. It is to repair the ravages of this short and transient evil that Congress are now called on for some small remuneration to the victims of injustice and oppression which it produced. But let us only take a glance at England, the history of which is so replete with examples full of illustration of the arguments and principles on which the resolutions on your table are predicated. Look at the numerous cases of reversals of attainders; of restoration of forfeited estates; the remissions of fines and penalties, inflicted as well by acts of Parliament as by the iniquitous and oppressive convictions and condemnations by her servile and time-serving courts of justice; reversed, remitted, and restored, by subsequent acts of Parliament, with which the records of her legislative journals, as well as the history of the times, is full; and tell me, Mr. Chairman, whether the legitimacy of this exercise of power has been ever questioned? Or whether, on the contrary, it has not received the universal sanction of the virtuous and the wise? And if a British Parliament can rescind the attainders, release the forfeitures, and remit the penalties, inflicted by the usurpations of their predecessors, by what argument, or on what principle, is the exercise of a similar power denied to the Congress of the United States? If the pretended omnipotence of the Parliament should be urged to justify these acts, may it not be replied, that the omnipotence of the Parliament who first enacted precluded the exercise of a repealing and restoring power—the act of Parliament, or sentence of the court of justice having had their intended operation, by vesting the forfeited estates or moneys on the Crown? And does not the argument apply with accumulated force when applied to the acts of a Legislature, like the Congress of the United States, strictly limited in its powers, whose enactments, of whatever character, when transcending those limits, are admitted to be void?

In the arguments which I have endeavored to present to the Senate, in the discussion of the question under deliberation, I have not thought it necessary, Mr. Chairman, to dwell on the personal merits of the petitioner now before you, or to inquire with minuteness into the correctness of the representations made by him of the circumstances of harshness, cruelty, partiality, or injustice, which may have attended his trial and conviction; or the circumstances of aggravation with which it is alleged the sentence of the court was carried into execution. If half the circumstances detailed by the glowing eloquence of the honorable chairman of the committee by whom the resolutions are reported are true, and they have not been seriously controverted, although not susceptible of legal proof after such a lapse of time, it only adds another dark shade to the picture of usurpation and oppression which is exhibited in the history of this unhappy act, from the moment of its inception to that of its final termination; and although, with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, I will not say that Matthew Lyon has been sacrificed, or fallen a martyr, a name reserved for those who have been sacrificed in a still more glorious cause, yet, without being the eulogist of Matthew Lyon, or endeavoring to press his personal merits, or even his sufferings, into this discussion, the decision of which depends on different and higher considerations than even these, I must be permitted to say, that the whole character of these proceedings is in perfect unison with the spirit and nature of the law under color of which they were instituted, and with the temper in which it was enacted; and that the entire history of the law, and its inflictions, furnish the citizens of this free and happy country with an example replete with instruction, a full review of which, at this period of calm and quiet, when no angry passions are excited to disturb or obscure the mind in forming a cool and unimpassioned judgment on the subject, is not only demanded of us by the petitioner, but may be of lasting benefit to the whole community.

The only objection, Mr. Chairman, which has been urged by the opposers of these resolutions which remains to be answered, is, that it would be inexpedient, were it admitted that Congress possessed the power to extend the relief prayed for to the petitioner. This objection being one which results from, and is to be governed more by, sentiments and feelings, than by strict logical argument, it affords room for more diversity of opinion and action than those which have been hitherto noticed. And, in accordance with my own views and sentiments on this branch of the argument, I shall content myself with the free expression of my own opinion and rule of action, in deciding on the appeals of individuals of this nation to the Congress of the United States for the redress of injustice and oppression ; that to do justice is always expedient, and that no apprehensions of inconvenience, or speculations of future dangers, or evil consequences, to result from the application of this principle, ought to withhold its application. But there is another consideration, Mr. Chairman, which ought to apply itself with more force to the reflections of Congress than the redress of the individual wrongs of Matthew Lyon, inducing the adoption of the resolutions on your table. This consideration flows from the very circumstances of the expiration of the Sedition act by force of its own limitation, without the interposition of the active energies, or even the expression of an opinion, of any subsequent Congress, of its constitutionality or character, or the tendency of its provisions. I would therefore appeal to the Republicans of the present Congress, whether they do not owe it to themselves, to the party to which they belong, and to the principles which they profess, to place on their journals some recorded evidence of their opinion and sentiments in relation to the enactment and operations of this obnoxious measure as a monument, or seal of reprobation, to speak to all future times and future generations an interpretation of the Constitution, and of our opinions of this act, as a practical commentary on what we deem the liberty of the press. Do we not owe, sir, to the distinguished and patriotic Legislatures of the States, who interposed with the energies of freemen and with the light of truth to put down this formidable foe to freedom, and who interposed with such efficacy and success, an expression of the deliberate opinions of a Republican Congress of this measure, its spirit and tendency ? To me, the adoption of these resolutions, in this view, seems but the payment of a debt of justice and gratitude which we owe.

With a tender of my thanks to this honorable body for the attention with which they have honored me, I resume my seat.

stances, I shall not be able to attend upon it until after the Christmas holidays, and to respectfully ask it to allow me to resign the office of its Speaker, which I have the honor to hold, and to consider this as the act of my resignation. I beg the House also to permit me to reiterate the expression of my sincere acknowledgments and unaffected gratitude for the distinguished consideration which it has uniformly manifested for me.

I have the honor to be, with great esteem, your faithful and obedient servant,

H. CLAY.

THOMAS DOUGHERTY, Esq.,

Clerk of the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. NEWTON, the letter was ordered to lie on the table, and to be inserted in the Journal of the House.

On motion of Mr. N., the House then proceeded to the election of a Speaker.

The Clerk declared that, as this was an election to be made from amongst members of the House, no previous nomination was necessary. No nomination, therefore, was made.

Messrs. NEWTON and MOSELEY being appointed a committee to count the ballots, reported that the votes were—For John W. Taylor 40; for William Lowndes 34; for Samuel Smith 27; for John Sergeant 18; for Hugh Nelson 10; scattering 3.

Sixty-seven votes being necessary to a choice, and no member having the requisite majority, a second ballot took place; when the votes were thus reported: For Mr. Taylor 49; for Mr. Lowndes 44; for Mr. Smith 25; for Mr. Sergeant 13; scattering 1.

No choice being yet made, the House proceeded to a further ballot, when the votes given in were as follow: For Mr. Lowndes 56; for Mr. Taylor 50; for Mr. Smith 16; for Mr. Sergeant 11; scattering 1.

No choice having been yet made, the House proceeded to ballot a fourth time, when the following result was reported: For Mr. Lowndes 61; for Mr. Taylor 60; for Mr. Smith 11; scattering 3.

No one having yet a majority of all the votes, a fifth ballot took place, which resulted as follows: For Mr. Taylor 65; for Mr. Lowndes 63; for Mr. Smith 8; scattering 2.

A motion was then made that the House do now adjourn; and the question thereon being put by the Clerk, it was decided in the negative.

The House then proceeded to ballot a sixth time; and the votes, being counted, stood thus: For Mr. Taylor 67; for Mr. Lowndes 61; for Mr. Smith 7; scattering 1.

No election having yet taken place, another motion was then made to adjourn, and the vote thereon was—for adjourning 65, against it 68.

So the House refused to adjourn, and another ballot was held, which resulted as follows: For Mr. Taylor 62; for Mr. Lowndes 57; for Mr. Smith 15; scattering 1.

No choice having yet been made, a motion was made to adjourn, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 71. And the Clerk adjourned the House to 12 o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY November 14.

Several other members appeared and took their seats, to wit:

From New Hampshire, ARTHUR LIVERMORE; from Massachusetts, MARTIN KINSLEY; from New Jersey, HENRY SOUTHARD; from Pennsylvania, CHRISTIAN TARR; from Maryland, RAPHAEL NEALE; from Virginia, WILLIAM LEE BALL, PHILIP P. BARBOUR, and WILLIAM MCCOY; from South Carolina, ELIAS EARLE; from Tennessee, JOHN COCKE; and from Ohio, THOMAS R. ROSS.

The House then proceeded forthwith to ballot again for a Speaker of the House, in the place of Mr. CLAY, resigned. The votes having been counted, Mr. NEWTON reported, that the whole number of votes was 149; of which 75 were necessary to a choice; that the votes were: For Mr. Taylor 64; for Mr. Lowndes 54; for Mr. Smith 33; scattering 1.

No one having a majority of all the votes, the House proceeded to ballot the ninth time; when it appeared that the votes were: For Mr. Taylor 66; for Mr. Lowndes 47; for Mr. Smith 33; scattering 1.

No election having yet taken place, the House proceeded to ballot for the tenth time; and the result was declared as follows: For Mr. Taylor 64; for Mr. Smith 50; for Mr. Lowndes 25; scattering 1.

No election having yet taken place, the House proceeded to ballot for the eleventh time; when the following result was pronounced: For Mr. Taylor 61; for Mr. Smith 50; for Mr. Lowndes 31; for Mr. Sergeant 5; scattering 1.

No election having yet taken place, the House proceeded to ballot for the twelfth time; and the result was as follows: For Mr. Smith 53; for Mr. Taylor 47; for Mr. Lowndes 23; for Mr. Sergeant 19; for Mr. Tomlinson 3; scattering 3.

The thirteenth ballot resulted as follows: For Mr. Smith 48; for Mr. Taylor 32; for Mr. Sergeant 32; for Mr. Lowndes 30; scattering 3.

The fourteenth ballot resulted as follows: For Mr. Smith 42; for Mr. Lowndes 37; for Mr. Sergeant 35; for Mr. Taylor 27; scattering 3.

The fifteenth ballot resulted as follows: For Mr. Lowndes 55; for Mr. Sergeant 32; for Mr. Smith 27; for Mr. Taylor 26; scattering 6.

No one yet having a majority of the votes, a further ballot was declared necessary; when (it being half-past 3 o'clock,)

A motion was made to adjourn, and negatived.

The sixteenth ballot then took place, and was as follows: For Mr. Lowndes 68; for Mr. Taylor 30; for Mr. Sergeant 24; for Mr. Smith 23.

This ballot having been also ineffectual; another motion was made to adjourn, but without success.

The House then proceeded to the seventeenth ballot, which resulted as follows—73 necessary to a choice: For Mr. Lowndes 72; for Mr. Taylor 44; for Mr. Smith 17; for Mr. Sergeant 11.

No election being made, the House went into the eighteenth ballot, when the following result was announced—73 necessary to a choice: For NOVEMBER, 1820.

Election of Speaker.

H. OF R.

Mr. Lowndes 66; for Mr. Taylor 55; for Mr. Smith 21; for Mr. Sergeant 2.

No one having yet a majority of the votes, the House proceeded to the nineteenth ballot, which resulted as follows—73 necessary to a choice: For Mr. Taylor 66; for Mr. Lowndes 65; for Mr. Smith 14.

This ballot being also ineffectual; a motion was made to adjourn, which motion prevailed, ayes 76—and, about five o'clock, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, November 15.

Several other members appeared, and took their seats, to wit:

From Vermont, CHARLES RICH; from Pennsylvania, GEORGE DENNISON; from Maryland, THOMAS BAYLY; from North Carolina, CHARLES FISHER; and from South Carolina, ELDRED SIMKINS.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

The House, having been called to order at twelve o'clock, proceeded to ballot, the twentieth time, for a Speaker, in the place of Mr. Clay, resigned.

The votes having been counted, it appeared that the number of votes given in was 141—necessary to a choice 71. Of which there were: For Mr. Taylor 67; for Mr. Lowndes 65; for Mr. Smith 8; scattering 1.

No choice having been made, the House proceeded to ballot the twenty-first time; when the result was declared as follows: Whole number of votes 147—necessary to a choice 74; of which there were: For Mr. Taylor 73; for Mr. Lowndes 42; for Mr. Smith 32.

No choice having yet been made, the House was about to ballot again; when

Mr. LITTLE rose, and, remarking on the extraordinary aspect of the present proceedings of the House; the necessity for choosing a Speaker; the uncertainty, under present appearances, when a choice would be made; the weariness of the House at these repeated ballottings, &c.—moved, that the House do come to a resolution, that the lowest on each ballot should be dropped at the succeeding ballot, and that any votes given for such lowest person should not be taken into account.

The CLERK of the House, after reading the resolve, expressed doubts of the power of the House to pass such a resolution, consistently with the rules established for its government.

Mr. RANDOLPH made it a point of order whether the Clerk had any right to express to the House his opinion of their powers, or to decide for them what was, or was not, in order.

The CLERK declared, that, under the rules of the House, which prescribe the mode of election by ballot, he could not receive this motion.

Some brief debate took place on the point of order, Mr. RANDOLPH protesting against what he pronounced an assumption of power on the part of the Clerk, and asserting the right of any member to propound any question to the House through the Clerk, the Speaker's Chair being vacant, or from himself, if he thought proper.

Other gentlemen, Mr. STORRS, Mr. LITTLE, Mr. SERGEANT, Mr. MERCER, and Mr. LIVERMORE, expressed their opinions, and the following rule of the House was read:

“In all other cases of ballot than for committees, a majority of the votes given shall be necessary to an election; and, when there shall not be such a majority on the first ballot, the ballot shall be repeated until a majority be obtained.”

Mr. LITTLE, asserting his right to make the motion, yet, not desiring to prolong discussion in regard to it, waived the moving of it himself.

The House then proceeded to ballot the twenty-second time. The whole number of votes was 148—75 necessary to a choice. The votes were—For Mr. Taylor 76; for Mr. Lowndes 44; for Mr. Smith 27; scattering 1.

So JOHN W. TAYLOR, Esq., a Representative from the State of New York, was elected Speaker; and, having been conducted to the Chair by Mr. NEWTON and Mr. MOSELEY, addressed the House as follows:

Gentlemen: I approach the station to which your favor invites me, greatly distrusting my ability to fulfil your just expectations. Although the duties of the Chair have become less arduous by improvements in its practice during the administration of my distinguished predecessor, I should not venture to assume their responsibilities without a firm reliance on your indulgent support. In all deliberative assemblies, the preservation of order must depend in a greater degree upon the members at large than upon any efforts of a presiding officer. The forbearance and decorum which characterized this House in its former session, at a period of peculiar excitement, afford of their continued exercise a happy anticipation. For the confidence with which you have honored me, be pleased to accept my profound acknowledgments. In my best endeavors to merit your approbation, which shall not be intermitted, I can promise nothing more than diligence, and a constant aim at impartiality. I can hope for nothing greater than that these endeavors may not prove altogether unavailing.

The new members having been sworn in—

A message was received from the Senate, informing the House that a quorum thereof was formed, and that they were ready to proceed to business.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, a similar message was returned to the Senate.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, also, a committee was appointed, jointly with such committee as should be appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him of the organization of the two Houses, and of their readiness to receive any communication he may have to make to them.

Mr. GROSS, of New York, offered for consideration the following resolve :

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare and report to this House, as soon as may be, a list of all the expenditures, under their proper heads, authorized by the existing laws of the United States, with an opinion respecting the reduction, which, consistently with the public interest, may be made in each of them respectively.

Mr. G. said the motion related to a subject which ought, in his opinion, to receive the early and earnest consideration of the House ; but, not wishing to take the House by surprise, he should move for it to lie on the table for the present.

It was ordered to lie on the table accordingly.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution :

Resolved, That the following addition be made to the standing rules and orders of the House, viz :

SOLOMON SIBLEY appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified and took his seat as a delegate from the Territory of Michigan, in the room of William W. Woodbridge, resigned.

Mr. BATES presented a petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Arkansas, praying that the right of pre-emption may be extended to the inhabitants of that portion of said Territory lying south of the river Arkansas, in the purchase of the lands on which they have long resided and made valuable improvements.—Referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDDY submitted the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act entitled an act allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the delegates from the Territories, and repealing all other laws on that subject, as to reduce the compensation thereby allowed from eight to six dollars per day, and the rate of travel for every twenty miles, from eight to six dollars; and that said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The said resolution was read; and the question was taken, Will the House now proceed to consider the same? and determined in the negative—yeas 58, nays 61.

Mr. STORRS submitted the following:

Resolved, That the 18th rule of the standing rules and orders of this House be annulled.

The 18th rule is in the following words:

"Business referred to committees of the whole House shall be called for in the following order:

1. Private bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported favorably by a committee of the House.
2. Private bills reported by committees of the House.
3. Bills and resolutions of a public nature.
4. Bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported against by a committee of the House.
5. Reports unfavorable to petitioners."

The motion of Mr. STORRS lies on the table one day of course.

On motion of Mr. BLOOMFIELD, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 16th instant, respecting the reference of petitions; and the same being again read, was modified and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That in all cases where petitions were presented at the last session to this House, and referred to committees, but not reported upon, the said petitions shall be again considered as referred to the said committees, respectively, upon application of any member to the Clerk, without special order from the House to that effect. And it shall be the duty of the said committees, respectively, to consider and report thereon, in the same manner as if said petitions were referred by special orders of the House; but no petition shall be received or acted upon by a committee, under this order, which shall not have been endorsed in, and transmitted to the committee through, the office of the Clerk.

Mr. COCKE, of Tennessee, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Military Establishment be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the Military Peace Establishment of the United States.

And the resolution was agreed to, without debate or division.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. FOOT on the 17th instant, for the appointment of a standing committee for the examination of engrossed bills; and the same being again read, the question was taken, Will the House agree to the same? and determined in the negative.

COMPENSATION OF MEMBERS.

Mr. LINN, of New Jersey, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be directed to inquire into the expediency of reducing the compensation allowed to members of Congress to six dollars per day, and a proportional reduction for travelling to and from the Seat of Government; and also of reducing the pay of all the officers of Government that has been increased since the year 1809, to what it was at or before that period.

Mr. LINN made a few remarks on introducing this proposition, the import of which was, that his opinion was that Congress ought to go back to the year 1809, and restore the compensations of public officers, &c., to the condition in which they then stood. As the present proposition, however, was for inquiry merely, not requiring any expression of the opinion of the House, he hoped no objection would be made to it.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, said a few words expressive of his opinion, that, if a reduction of expenditures, &c., was made, it ought to be more general than was proposed by this motion to be inquired into. To such a general reduction he was favorable, but was opposed to a piece-meal legislation on the subject, which must be partial, and might be unjust in its operation. This was the substance of Mr. C's. observation, though not perhaps his words. He wished the resolution to be so modified as to make it as comprehensive as in his opinion it ought to be.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, thought the object of this motion did not properly fall within the duties of the Committee of Ways and Means, and wished it referred to a different committee.

Mr. LINN did not wish to take the House by surprise, and consented to his motion's lying on the table, that gentlemen might have an opportunity to prepare amendments to it if they thought proper.

So the resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, submitted for consideration a joint resolution. In doing so, he expressed his earnest hope that, as a similar resolution had passed the Senate at the last session, but not been acted upon in this House for want of time, it would have an early consideration at this session, and receive that approbation from the House which he thought it merited. The following is a copy of the resolve moved by Mr. S.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution:

That, for the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled. The districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons entitled by the Constitution to be represented, or of persons qualified to vote for members of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. In each district, the persons qualified to vote shall choose one Representative.

That, for the purpose of choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, the persons qualified to vote for Representatives in each district shall choose one Elector. The two additional Electors, to which each State is entitled, shall be appointed in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct. The Electors, when convened, at the time and place prescribed by law for the purpose of voting for President and Vice President of the United States, shall have power, in case any of them shall fail to attend, to choose an Elector or Electors, in place of him or them so failing to attend. The division of States into districts, as hereby provided for, shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted, and immediately after every future census and apportionment of Representatives under the same; and such districts shall not be altered until a subsequent census shall have been taken, and an apportionment of Representatives under it shall have been made.

The resolution was twice read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

TUESDAY, November 21.

Mr. WENDOVER presented a petition of the American Society, of the city of New York, for the encouragement of domestic manufactures, praying that a duty of ten per centum be imposed on sales at auction; that the credit on duties on the importation of foreign fabrics may be abolished, and that the tariff may be so graduated as to carry into effect a complete system of protection to home industry; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, presented a memorial and petition of Matthew Lyon, praying that his petition, presented at the last session, may now be considered, and the prayer thereof granted, so that the justice to which his case may entitle him, and which has been so long withheld, may now be granted; which was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. McLEAN, of Kentucky, FLOYD, EDWARDS, of North Carolina, PLUMER, and BEECHER, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. BATES presented a petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Arkansas, praying that some provision may be made for the relief of the settlers on the public lands, who have been compelled to abandon their settlements made prior to the twelfth of April, 1814, under the treaty lately concluded between the United States and the Cherokee nation of Indians; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BATES also presented another petition of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Arkansas, praying that some provision may be made to coerce the attendance within their districts of individuals appointed to offices in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have elected the Reverend William Ryland a Chaplain to Congress on their part. And they have passed a resolution for the appointment of a joint Library Committee, who shall have the direction of the money appropriated to the purchase of books and maps, for the use of the two Houses of Congress, and have appointed a committee on their part. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act to alter the terms of the district court in Alabama;" in which resolution and bill they ask the concurrence of this House.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made an unfavorable report on the petition of the General Assembly of the Territory of Arkansas, praying for the establishment of a surveyor's office in that Territory; which was concurred in by the House.

The resolution from the Senate for the appointment of a joint Library committee was read, and concurred in by the House; and Messrs. MALLARY, PARKER, of Virginia, and ALLEN, of Tennessee, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the terms of the district court in Alabama," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

On motion of Mr. ABBOT, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law, defining under what circumstances, and by what means, private property may be taken for public use, under the emergency of war, and providing that just compensation shall be made for the same; also, of prescribing the manner in which soldiers may be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, in time of war.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Committee of Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of admitting British vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope and the Mauritius, into the ports of the United States, on the same terms and conditions as if they had sailed from a port in Great Britain, so long as those ports are open to the vessels of the United States on the same terms and conditions as their own vessels.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, the House proceeded to consider the resolution, submitted by him yesterday, to annul the eighteenth rule of the standing rules and orders of this House; and the said resolution being again read, was agreed to by the House.

The said eighteenth rule, as annulled, is in the words following, viz.:

"Business referred to committees of the whole House shall be called for consideration in the following order:

1. Private bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported favorably by a committee of the House.
2. Private bills reported by committees of the House.
3. Bills and resolutions of a public nature.
4. Bills which have passed the Senate, and have been reported against by a committee of the House.
5. Reports unfavorable to petitioners."

Mr. MALLARY submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before this House information respecting the progress made by the Commissioners under the Treaty of Ghent, in establishing the boundary line between the United States and the Canadas; whether any part of the boundary line is settled; whether the Commissioners of the United States and Great Britain have met during the present year; and how much money has been drawn from the Treasury for the purpose aforesaid; and how much each Commissioner, Agent, or any person on their account, has drawn; the names of each person employed by the said Commissioners and Agents, in their respective sections; the purposes for which each person was employed, the length of time employed, and the compensation each person has received for his services; a statement of all the items of account rendered by each of said Commissioners and Agents, and the particular purposes for which the moneys drawn by them have been expended; the amount of compensation each Commissioner and Agent has received since his appointment; and whether any money has been allowed to, or retained by, said Commissioners and Agents, except the sum of $1,444 44 per annum.

The resolution was agreed to nem. con., and a committee was appointed to present it to the President.

WEDNESDAY, November 22.

Another member, to wit, from South Carolina, CHARLES PINCKNEY, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. KINSLEY presented a petition of sundry persons interested in commerce, inhabitants of Belfast, in the State of Maine, praying that no alteration may be made in the existing tariff of duties on foreign goods imported into the United States, injurious to the commercial interest, for the purpose of extending further protection to the manufacturing interest of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to alter the terms of the district court in Alabama," reported the same without amendment, and it was ordered to be read a third time to-day; and was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on the Public Lands, made a report on the petition of William McIntosh, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, also made a report on the petition of Nicholas Jarrott, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. FULLER, it was

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House what naval force has been stationed for the protection of the commerce of our citizens in the West India islands, and parts adjacent, during the present year, and whether any depredations by pirates, or others, upon the property of citizens of the United States engaged in such commerce, have been reported to our Government.

MESSRS. FULLER and WENDOVER were appointed a committee to present the foregoing resolution to the President of the United States.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the bill, which originated at the last session, supplementary to the several acts for the adjusting of land claims in the State of Louisiana and Territory of Missouri, was taken up and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

After a number of remarks from Mr. FORD, to show why favor ought to be shown in this case, the report of the Committee of Ways and Means, of the last session, unfavorable to the petition of Perley Keyes and Jason Fairbanks, was taken up, and, on motion of Mr. F., recommitted to the same committee.

Mr. LINN moved to proceed to the consideration of his motion directing the Committee of Ways and Means to inquire into the expediency of reducing the compensation of members of Congress, and of the officers of Government generally, to the rates at which they stood in 1809; but the House refused to consider the same.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, remarked that several propositions had been already made, looking to a reduction in the expenditures of the Government, none of which exactly corresponded with his views; to exhibit which he offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Expenditures be instructed to prepare and report a system of retrenchment in the expenditures in the various departments of the Government, (not inconsistent with the public interest,) which will restore that rigid economy and simplicity becoming our Republican institutions, and which the present stagnation of commerce, and the embarrassments attending every branch of domestic industry, imperiously demand.

And the question being put that the House do now proceed to consider the said resolve, it was decided in the negative.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, presented to the Chair the following series of propositions:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient that the annual expenses of the Government should be reduced; that, for the accomplishment of this object, it is further

2. Resolved, That such offices as are not immediately necessary for the transaction of public business, and the abolition of which would not be detrimental to the public interest, shall be abolished.

3. Resolved, That the salaries of all civil officers whose compensation has been increased since the year 1809 shall be reduced to what they were at that period.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to reduce the Army to the number of six thousand non-commissioned officers, musicians, and privates, preserving such part of the corps of engineers, without regard to that number, as may be required by the public interest; and including such reduction of the general staff as may be required by the state of the Army when reduced as herein proposed.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient that the appropriations for the erection of fortifications shall be so made as to require a less sum annually, by extending the time within which they shall be completed.

6. Resolved, That the act making an appropriation of one million of dollars per annum for the increase of the Navy be so amended as to extend the time within which such increase shall be made, and to reduce the annual appropriation to the sum of five hundred thousand dollars.

7. Resolved, That it is expedient to recall from active service one-half the naval force now employed, and to place the same in ordinary.

8th Resolution refers the subjects of the preceding resolves to the proper standing and select committees, to bring in bills pursuant thereto.

The House having agreed to consider these resolutions—

Mr. COBB said, he had no intention to bring on the discussion of them at this time, having presented them by way of notice to members, that they might be prepared to discuss and decide on them when called up. He was not even himself prepared at this moment to give his views of the subjects embraced in these resolutions; nor did he know that the House ought to proceed to act on them, until it should have received, first, the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and, secondly, a report from the Secretary of War, required by a resolution of the House at the last session, of a plan whereupon a reduction of the Army might be advantageously made. To place these resolves in a situation which would enable him to call them up at any time, he moved their reference to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Which motion was agreed to.

THURSDAY, November 23.

Mr. CUSHMAN presented the petition of the trustees of the Somerset Agricultural Society, in the county of Somerset and State of Maine, praying that the bill pending before Congress at the last session, establishing a new tariff of duties on goods imported into the United States, may be passed into a law, so as to extend further protection to the manufacturing interest of the country.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, presented a memorial of the merchants and other inhabitants of the town of Petersburg, in that State, in opposition to the passage of the said bill.—Referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Ordered, That the Committee on the Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, supplementary to the several acts for the adjustment of land claims in the State of Louisiana, and Territory of Missouri, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House the regulations which he has adopted in the administration of the act of Congress of May 1st, 1820, entitled "An act in addition to an act to provide for certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States in the Revolutionary war, passed March 18, 1818." Whether any person except paupers, or such as have been partially supported by public or private charity, have been continued on the pension roll; and, if any, whether the value of their property, as returned on their schedule, in any case exceeded two hundred dollars, and how much. Whether debts, which the applicants owed, have been or are considered in the estimation of their circumstances, income, or means of subsistence; and how many are continued on the pension roll under said act.

The bill to provide for the preservation and repair of the Cumberland road having been called up, the House voted not to go into Committee thereon.

On motion of Mr. KENT, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the consideration of the bill "to repeal part of an act to authorize the President and Managers of the Washington (Georgetown) Turnpike Company in Maryland, to extend and make their road to and from Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, through the said District, to the line thereof," and it was re-committed to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

ELIAS PARKS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Elias Parks.

[The case of Mr. Parks is substantially this: The petitioner had chartered a boat, on the morning of the attack on Oswego, (on Lake Ontario,) in May, 1813, for the purpose of transporting merchandise to a place of safety. The boat had departed from Oswego in pursuit of that object, when she was ordered back by Colonel Mitchell, who commanded the post, was taken possession of by Captain Romaine, under that order, for the use of the troops, and the goods placed on the wharf, and, with the boat, put under the charge of sentinels. Afterwards, the fort being stormed, and the town taken, the goods fell into the hands of the enemy. The petitioner prays indemnification for his loss. The report of the Committee of Claims is, that his petition ought not to be granted.]

Mr. STORRS moved to reverse the report, so as to allow the petitioner the value of the goods in the boat at the time of its seizure.

This motion gave rise to considerable debate; in the course of which, the motion of Mr. STORRS was supported by Messrs. STORRS, GROSS, of New York, and STEVENS; and opposed by Messrs. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and McCoy.

The result of the debate was, that Mr. STORRS's motion was agreed to, and, the decision having been reported to the House, was then concurred in; and, on motion of Mr. STORRS, the report was recommitted to the committee who reported it, with instructions to bring in a bill pursuant to the amended report.

MILITARY ROAD IN MAINE.

Mr. HILL submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of opening a military and post road from some place on the Penobscot river, in the State of Maine, to the river St. Croix.

Mr. H. in introducing this resolution, said, that Maine was a frontier State, bordering on the British Provinces, for a distance of more than five hundred miles. The distance from the Penobscot river to the British lines is not short of one hundred and twenty miles. The road, for the greatest part of the distance, is impassable for any kind of carriages. The towns of Eastport and Lubeck, with several others near the boundary line, are very fast rising into consequence. At Eastport and Lubeck there is one of the finest harbors in the United States, and it is defensible. It was of great importance, he said, that there should be a good carriage road to the extremities of Maine, whereto to transport the mail; for, in case of another war with Great Britain, which he hoped would never happen, it will be a war, not on our territories, but on the ocean and in the English provinces. Mr. H. said, he was aware that a celebrated military sovereign of Europe remarked, that "he had no idea of making roads for his enemies;" but, said Mr. H. we have no fear of an invasion in Maine by land. In the late war, there was physical, moral, and mental strength enough in Maine, if we had been masters of our own fortunes, to have driven the enemy from Castine headlong into the sea. Moreover, there are no national vessels built in Maine, although possessing a seacoast of two hundred and fifty miles, containing more than a hundred spacious harbors, having a population of three hundred thousand, owning about one-ninth of the whole tonnage of the United States, and can furnish timber and ship-builders inferior to none in America; and yet we have no dock-yards, nor patronage from the nation. We have been patriotic and dutiful children, always ready to shoulder our muskets in the defence of our country's rights. Massachusetts expended a million of dollars in the late war which has not been refunded. One-third thereof belonged to Maine. She deploras the policy of those times, in our beloved parent State, but Maine has washed her hands from that pollution; she expects justice, magnanimity, and remuneration, from the General Government, in some way or other. He hoped, therefore, the resolution would pass.

The question being taken on agreeing to said resolution, it was decided in the affirmative—52 to 41.

PUBLIC LANDS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for paying to the State of Illinois three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands within the same.

Mr. COBB having inquired on what grounds the merits of the bill rested—

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, briefly explained that the object of this bill was to obtain the payment to the State of Illinois of the three per cent. reserved for her use out of the moneys accruing to the Treasury of the United States for the sales of public lands in that State; the Secretary of the Treasury not feeling himself authorized to pay over the money without express authority by law. A similar law had already been passed in relation to the State of Indiana, and the passage of this bill was little more than a matter of course, it being to carry into effect a compact with the State of Illinois.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, hesitated about voting for this bill, under the impression that it proposed to divert this fund from the purposes of making roads within the State, to a different purpose, viz: the encouragement of schools and colleges. If that were the object, he said he could not vote for it, because it would violate the compact.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio, said he had not the least doubt of the propriety of passing the law, and he thought the gentleman from Maryland would be of the same opinion with him when the clause of the compact by which Illinois was admitted into the Union, was read. Mr. C. then read that clause, in the following words:

"3d. That five per cent. of the net proceeds of the land lying within such State, and which shall be sold by Congress from and after the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be reserved for the purposes following, viz: Two-fifths to be disbursed under the direction of Congress, in making roads leading to the State, the residue to be appropriated by the Legislature of the State for the encouragement of learning, of which one-sixth part shall be exclusively bestowed on a college or university."

From this it appeared that the proposed bill was a mere legislative form for accomplishing an act already binding on the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, said there was no difficulty at all in this subject, well understood. In most of the ordinances for the admission of States into the Union, the stipulation is, that, of the five per cent. reserved from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, two per cent. shall be applied to the construction of roads leading to the States, and three per cent. shall be applied by the State itself to making roads within the State. But, in the case of Illinois, an exception was made, on the representation of her then Delegate, that the fund would not be required for roads within the State, and the Legislature was authorized to apply the three per cent. to schools and colleges instead of roads. The Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to that caution which always governs him, declined paying over this money to the State authorities without the authority of an act of Congress; and the object of this bill was to give that authority.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, professing himself entirely satisfied with these explanations, withdrew his opposition; and the bill was reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

ADMISSION OF MISSOURI.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the select committee to whom was referred the constitution formed for their government by the people of Missouri, delivered in the following report:

The committee to whom has been referred the constitution of the State of Missouri respectfully report:

That they have not supposed themselves bound to inquire whether the provisions of the constitution referred to them be wise or liberal. The grave and difficult question as to the restraints which should be imposed upon the power of Missouri to form a constitution for itself was decided by the act of the last session, and the committee have had only to examine whether the provisions of the act have been complied with. In the opinion of the committee, they have been. The propositions, too, which were offered in the same act to the free acceptance or rejection of the people of Missouri, have all been accepted by them. But there remains a question too important to be overlooked.

We know that cases must often arise in which there may be a doubt whether the laws or constitution of a State do not transcend the line (sometimes the obscure line) which separates the powers of the different governments of our complex system. It appears to the committee, that, in general, it must be unwise in Congress to anticipate judicial decisions by the exposition of an equivocal phrase, and that it would be yet more objectionable, by deciding on the powers of a State just emerged from territorial dependence, that it should give the weight of its authority to an opinion which might condemn the laws and constitutions of old, as well as sovereign States. The committee are not unaware that a part of the twenty-sixth section of the third article of the constitution of Missouri, by which the Legislature of the State has been directed to pass laws "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, the State," has been construed to apply to such of that class as are citizens of the United States, and that their exclusion has been deemed repugnant to the Federal Constitution. The words which are objected to are to be found in the laws of at least one of the Middle States, (Delaware,) and a careful examination of the clause might perhaps countenance the opinion that it applies to the large class of free negroes and mulattoes who cannot be considered as the citizens of any State. But, of all the articles in our constitution, there is probably not one more difficult to construe well than that which gives to the citizens of each State the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States; there is not one, an attention to whose spirit is more necessary to the convenient and beneficial connexion of the States; nor one of which too large a construction would more completely break down their defensive power, and lead more directly to their consolidation. This much, indeed, seems to be settled by the established constitutions of States in every section of the Union; that a State has a right to discriminate between the white and the black man, both in respect to political and civil privileges, though both be citizens of another State; to give to the one, for instance, the right of voting and of serving on juries, which it refuses to the other. How far this discrimination may be carried, is obviously a matter of nice and difficult inquiry. The committee do not propose to engage in it. They believe it best, whenever a case occurs which must necessarily involve the decision of it, that it should be remitted to judicial cognizance.

In this view (which narrows their inquiries and duties) the committee are confirmed, by a consideration of the embarrassments and disasters which a different course of proceeding might sometimes produce. When a people are authorized to form a State, and do so, the trammels of their Territorial condition fall off. They have performed the act which makes them sovereign and independent. If they pass an unconstitutional law, and we leave it, as we should that of another State, to the decision of a judicial tribunal, the illegal act is divested of its force by the operation of a system with which we are familiar. The control of the General Government is exercised in each particular case, in support of individual right, and the State retains the condition which it has just acquired, and would not easily renounce. But a decision by Congress against the constitutionality of a law passed by a State which it had authorized the establishment, could not operate directly by vacating the law; nor is it believed that it could reduce the State to the dependence of a Territory. In these circumstances, to refuse admission into the Union to such a State, is to refuse to extend over it that judicial authority which might vacate the obnoxious law, and to expose all the interests of the Government within the territory of that State, to a Legislature and a Judiciary, the only checks on which have been abandoned. On the other hand, if Congress shall determine neither to expound clauses which are obscure, nor to decide Constitutional questions which must be difficult and perplexing, equally interesting to old States, whom our construction could not, as to the new, whom it ought not to coerce, the rights and duties of Missouri will be left to the determination of the same temperate and impartial tribunal which has decided the conflicting claims, and received the confidence, of the other States.

The committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

This report having been read by the Clerk, the resolution therein referred to was read, as follows:

Whereas, in pursuance of an act of Congress passed on the sixth day of March, one thousand eight hundred and twenty, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Missouri Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, and to prohibit slavery in certain Territories," the people of said Territory did, on the nineteenth day of July, in the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty, by a convention called for the purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution and State government, so formed, is republican, and in conformity to the provisions of the said act:

Be it therefore resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the State of Missouri shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and is admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever.

The resolution was then read a second time.

Mr. LOWNDES moved to refer the resolution to a Committee of the Whole, on the state of the Union, which would put it in the power of the House to act upon it at any time it thought proper. He need not say, that there was no disposition to act upon this subject without full notice to all parties concerned; and if no other person did, he should himself, when proposing to call for the consideration of the report, give a day or two notice of his intention to do so. Whilst up, he took occasion to say, that this report, as indeed all reports of committees, must be considered as the act of a majority of the committee, and not as expressing the sentiments of every individual of the committee.

The reference was agreed to.

FRIDAY, November 24.

Two members appeared and took their seats, viz: from Maryland, THOMAS CULBRETH, and from Virginia, JOHN TYLER.

Mr. TYLER presented the memorial of the merchants and other citizens of Richmond and its vicinity, against an increase of the tariff of duties on imports; a discontinuance of the credit now granted on said duties; the abolition of drawbacks of duties and other restrictions on the commerce of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, presented a report on the petition of Daniel Lathrop, late a postmaster at Waterbury, in New York, praying relief from the loss of a sum of money received by him for postages, the same having been wasted by a person in whose care it had been placed for the use of the General Post Office; which report was concurred in by the House.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, presented the following report:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred the memorial of the inhabitants of Salem, report—

That the memorialists pray Congress to exempt from duty all imported books in the learned and foreign languages, whether reprinted in this country, and all works of science, in the English language, which shall not be reprinted here within the term of one year from their original publication.

The committee submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer the memorialists.

The same was read, and concurred in.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John Stipp; which was concurred in.

Mr. SMITH, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Samuel Peckham, Jr., Inspector of Customs for the district of Vermont, stating that he obtained a judgment against Nathaniel Tuft for goods illegally imported, in 1812, to the amount of three thousand six hundred dollars, and that by an act of Congress said Tuft and his security were released from confinement for the debt, whereby he lost his one quarter part of the amount of said seizure, and praying that the same may be allowed to him; which report was read, and concurred in.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made a report on the petition of Curtis Lewis, of Mobile, that the object of the memorial falls properly within the scope of the authority of the district court of Alabama, as regulated by an act of the present session; which report was agreed to.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Andrew Kennedy; which was twice read and committed.

Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Daniel Seward; which was read a first and second time, and committed.

The engrossed bill to provide for paying to the State of Illinois the amount of three per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of public lands within the State of Illinois, was read a third time, passed, and ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.

CLAIM OF JOHN COWAN.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the petition of John Cowan.

[Mr. COWAN prays the allowance of four hundred and sixty dollars for shoeing, at their own expense, the horses of a company of cavalry in the service of the United States, from September 28, 1814, to March 28, 1815, and of fifty-two dollars paid for forage, in consequence of the United States failing to supply the same. The committee report against the claim, as well because the allowance of forty cents per day ought to cover the expense of shoeing, as because of the informality of the evidence in support of the claim.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, moved to reverse the report in this case, so as to declare that the claim ought to be allowed.

This motion gave rise to debate, being supported by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, and Mr. RICH, of Vermont.

In the end, the motion to amend the report was negatived—55 to 41; and this being reported to the House, was there concurred in, and the original report was agreed to.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, November 27.

Another member, to wit: from Mississippi, CHRISTOPHER RANKIN, appeared and took his seat.

Public Buildings.

H. OF R.

A new member, to wit: from Massachusetts, BENJAMIN GORHAM, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Jonathan Mason, also appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. MOSELEY presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of New Haven in the State of Connecticut, against any alteration in the tariff of duties on imports, by way of protection and encouragement to the manufacturing interest of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. LOWNDES presented a similar memorial of a convention of delegates, representing the merchants and others interested in commerce, assembled in the city of Philadelphia; which was also referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. LOWNDES presented a petition of Enrico Causici, sculptor, praying to be employed to execute, in marble, a statue representing the Genius of the Constitution, a cast of which, in plaster, is now placed above the Speaker's chair, in the Hall of this House; or that he may be employed to execute a colossal statue of the General Baron de Kalb, ordered to be erected to the memory of that officer by Congress, in the year 1780; which petition was referred to the Committee on the Public Buildings.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a certificate of the election of EDWARD B. JACKSON, of Virginia; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Private Land Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the act, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis," passed on the 8th day of May, 1820, so as to except from the location of the land therein mentioned, town lots and sites for towns.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was recommitted a report of last session on the petition of Perley Keyes and Jason Fairbanks, reported a bill for their relief; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, pursuant to instructions, reported a bill for the relief of Elias Parks; which was twice read, and committed.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Joseph Janney.

[Mr. Janney, a resident in the Northern Neck, in Virginia, represents, that, during the stay of the British in the Rappahannock river, in Virginia, they destroyed, in one of their incursions, his dwelling-house, &c., which were at the time occupied by the militia; and that he believes this destruction was solely caused by the fact of the buildings having been used for military purposes. For this loss he prays compensation. The committee report against his petition.]

Mr. GARNETT, of Virginia, moved to reverse the report, so as to declare that the prayer of the petition ought to be granted.

On this motion a smart debate took place between Mr. GARNETT on one side, and Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, on the other; which resulted in the rejection of Mr. GARNETT's motion, by a considerable majority, and the final concurrence in the original report of the committee.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Claims unfavorable to the petition of the levy court of Calvert county, Maryland, who ask indemnification for the loss of the courthouse of the county, destroyed by fire by the British during the late war in consequence of its having been occupied for military purposes.

Mr. NEALE, of Maryland, moved to reverse the report, so as to declare that the petition is reasonable and ought to be granted; and supported his motion with much earnestness. He was seconded by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and opposed by Mr. WILLIAMS, the chairman of the Committee of Claims.

The motion to amend was negatived by 61 votes to 49, and the original report concurred in by the same majority.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

In conformity with a resolution of the Senate of the 28th of January, 1818, I communicate herewith to the House of Representatives the report of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, required by that resolution.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Nov, 22, 1820.

To the President of the United States:

SIR: The expenditures on account of the centre building of the Capitol, from October 1, 1819, to the 30th of September, 1820, as far as regular vouchers have been received, amount to one hundred and twenty-seven thousand three hundred and ninety-six dollars and fourteen cents. For the progress made in this building, I beg leave to refer to the report of the Architect, a copy of which, marked A, is annexed.

I have the honor to be, most respectfully, your obedient servant,

SAMUEL LANE,
Commissioner of Public Buildings.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 19, 1820.

SIR: At the close of the season for active operations, I present a statement of the proceedings for the past year, and of the progress made on the Capitol of the United States.

The alterations and improvements suggested for the Representatives' Room and Senate Chamber have been effected within the amount of the estimated expense. Considerable progress has also been made in regulating and improving the grounds: the planting of trees and shrubbery will be continued while the weather will permit.

The work on the centre of the Capitol has been urged on with as much force and despatch as the solid nature of its construction would allow. The external walls of the west projection, and the greater part of the internal walls connected with them, have been raised to the height contemplated in the estimate for the year. The roof is raised on the north flank of the centre, and that for the south flank is prepared, but has been prevented from being put on by the inclemency of the weather in October, and by an unusual sickness among the workmen. The wall of the east front is not raised as high as was expected, from an opinion that it would be more advisable that the inner walls of the great rotunda should be carried on at the same time, for the purpose of making a more equal bearing, and pressing more regularly on the foundation. The walls of the rotunda have accordingly been commenced, and give an opportunity of viewing the style and manner in which it will be finished. Although a portion of the labor has been differently bestowed from what was first contemplated, yet it is believed that it will appear that the change was judicious, and that as much progress has been made in the work as was promised or expected; that it has been done with economy; and that the expense has been kept within the estimates.

Respectfully submitted by your obedient servant,
CHARLES BULFINCH,
Architect Capitol U. S.
SAMUEL LANE, Esq., Commissioner, &c.

The Message and report having been read, were ordered to lie on the table.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and, on motion of Mr. SMITH, also, proceeded to the consideration of the motion, submitted by him, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it concerns the election of Electors of the President and Vice President of the United States.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. SMITH, declining entering into any argument in support of the proposition, on which his views had been fully expressed at the last session, said, he had called up the question at this early day, in the hope that an expression of the opinion of the House on the subject might be obtained at this session. He added a few other remarks. This House and the Senate, he said, were not, he begged gentlemen to remember, the last resort on this question. All that was asked of them was, to allow the question to be submitted to the people of the United States, as represented in the several State Legislatures, the consent of two-thirds of whom was necessary to sanction the act. If two-thirds of the people were in favor of the amendment, it ought to take place; if, on the other hand, they deemed the change inexpedient, they would say so, and the proposition would of course fall to the ground.

Mr. OVERSTREET, of South Carolina, moved to amend the following clause, by striking out the words therein which are printed in italic:

"The Electors, when convened, at the time and place prescribed by law for the purpose of voting for President and Vice President of the United States, shall have power, in case any of them shall fail to attend, to choose an Elector, or Electors, in place of him, or them, so failing to attend."

The object of Mr. O. was, that there should be a certain uniformity on this point, as well as in others embraced by the proposed amendment to the Constitution.

After a few words in reply from Mr. SMITH, the question was put on Mr. OVERSTREET'S motion, and decided in the negative.

The Committee then rose, and, without further debate, reported the resolution without amendment.

Mr. REID, of Georgia, then moved, with a view to allow further time for reflection on the subject, to lay the resolve on the table; which motion was decided in the affirmative by a vote of 67 to 64; and the resolve was laid on the table.

TUESDAY, November 28.

Another member, to wit, from New York, JAMES GUYON, junior, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. SIMKINS presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the upper country of the State of South Carolina; also, a memorial of the inhabitants of the district of Abbeville in that State, in opposition to any increase of the present tariff of duties on imports, by way of protection to the manufacturing interest of the country; which memorials were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. LOWNDES presented a memorial of sundry inhabitants of the District of Columbia, praying for the erection of suitable buildings for a penitentiary, and the establishment of a system of penitentiary jurisprudence within the said District; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, the bill of the last session, to provide for clothing the militia when called into actual service, was taken up, and re-committed to a Committee of the whole House.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill to amend the act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis, deceased; and

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee reported a bill for the relief of Jacob Hunsinger; which bills were severally twice read and committed.

On motion of Mr. TYLER, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering the Richmond collection district, so as to make the same extend from Bermuda Hundred to the mouth of Chickahomony river, including the shores of James river, on the north, as far as mid-channel.

On motion of Mr. STRONG, of New York, the Postmaster General was directed to report, as soon as may be, to this House, a list, if any, of mail contractors who are at the same time postmasters, and the compensation of such contractors and postmasters, designating the State or Territory in which they respectively reside.

Mr. STEVENS submitted the following motion: Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire and report whether, in their opinion, the public good requires that a tract of land be surveyed and appropriated for laying a road from the north boundary line of the State of Ohio to Detroit in a place most convenient for that purpose, and also sufficient to pay for working the same; and be further directed, in their opinion such appropriation would be of public utility, to report a bill for that purpose.

Mr. S. made a few observations to show the utility and expediency of the object contemplated by his motion; and the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. ANDERSON, the report communicated to the Senate from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting (pursuant to a resolution of the Senate, of 3d of April, 1820,) a statement of money annually appropriated, and paid, since the Declaration of Independence, for purchasing from the Indians, surveying, and selling the public lands; showing, as near as may be, the quantities of land which have been purchased; the number of acres which have been surveyed; the number sold, and the number which remain unsold; the amount of sales, the amount of forfeitures, the sums paid by purchasers, and the sums due from purchasers, and from receivers in each land district—was ordered to be printed for the use of this House.

On motion of Mr. STORRS,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury Department be directed to communicate to this House the amount of moneys drawn from the Treasury of the United States, by the War and Navy Departments, respectively, from the 30th day of December, 1819, to the 13th day of November instant, designating the amount drawn under each respective appropriation, together with an account of any transfers, which may have been made at the Treasury during the last recess of Congress, from one appropriation to any other; and, also, the aggregate amount of payments made during the same period by the Treasurer of the United States, as agent of the War and Navy Departments, respectively, on warrants drawn by the said Departments on the Treasurer as such agent, designating the amount of payments made under each head of appropriation, respectively, during the same period.

On motion of Mr. COOK, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to lay before this House a statement of the number of claims to military bounty land, for services rendered during the late war which remain unsatisfied; the aggregate amount of acres necessary to satisfy those claims; and the time when the lands will be ready to be distributed among the respective claimants.

THE SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting a list of balances on the books of the Second and Third Auditors, which have remained due more than three years prior to the 30th September, 1820; a list of such persons as have failed to render their accounts to said auditors within the year; and a list of advances made prior to the 3d March, 1809, by the War Department, and which remained to be accounted for on the books of the Third Auditor; which letter and accompanying documents were ordered to lie on the table.

JACOB SHAFER.

The House, then, on motion of Mr. B. SMITH, of Virginia, went into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Private Land Claims, made at the last session, unfavorable to the petition of Jacob Shafer to be confirmed in his claims to certain lands.

Mr. BALLARD SMITH moved to reverse the decision of that select committee, and declare the prayer of the petitioner, to a certain extent specified, such an one as ought to be granted; which motion he supported at some length.

Mr. CAMPBELL, chairman of the select committee, opposed the motion, and maintained the justice of the report.

Mr. SMITH rejoined; and, the question being taken, the motion to amend the report was negatived.

The Committee then rose, and the report was confirmed by the House.

VACCINE INSTITUTION.

The House, on motion of Mr. KENT, next resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate the Managers of the National Vaccine Institution.

Considerable time was spent in the details of this bill; in amending which, Mr. Foor and Mr. KENT took the chief part; after which, the bill was reported to the House, and the amendments agreed to; when the question was taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, and was decided in the affirmative—yeas 51, nays 44.

The bill for the relief of Nicholas Jarrot, also passed through a Committee of the Whole, and being reported to the House, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

LOAN OF MUNITIONS.

Mr. FORREST submitted the following, to wit:

Whereas it appears, by a report of the Secretary of War, dated the 12th day of February, 1820, made in pursuance of a resolution of the House of Representatives, that large loans of powder and lead, munitions of the United States, were made to private persons by the Ordnance department:

Therefore, resolved, that a select committee be appointed to inquire and report to this House, by whom the said loans were made; and by what authority; why the same was not reclaimed at the expiration of the loan; what time the said loans were reported to the head of the department, and, if a loss should be sustained, how far, and to whom is the responsibility attached for such loss. And, further, to report the proper mode of proceeding forthwith against such delinquent or delinquents, for the recovery of the same.

Mr. LOWNDES had not the smallest objection to the proposed inquiry; on the contrary, he was willing it should have the widest possible scope that should be deemed necessary; but he suggested to the mover the impropriety of prefixing to the motion a preamble which affirmed certain facts before they were ascertained to exist. The adoption of preambles was also at variance with the practice of the House, and, he believed, inconsistent with some of the rules of the House; and, with the view of obtaining such a modification of the motion as he had suggested it should assume, he moved that it be laid on the table until to-morrow; which course was assented to by Mr. FORREST, and the resolution was laid on the table accordingly.

WEDNESDAY, November 29.

On motion of Mr. McCox, the Committee on Private Land Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the location of land warrants issued to the Virginia State regiments for services during the Revolutionary war, on any of the unappropriated lands in the tract reserved in the State of Ohio for satisfying the warrants to the Virginia State line on Continental Establishment.

Mr. Cook submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making some provision whereby the actual settlers on the public lands, who settled previous to the 1st of July, 1820, shall be entitled to the preference in becoming the purchasers of a specified quantity, so as to embrace their improvements, at such price as may be deemed expedient.

The resolution was read, and the question was taken, Will the House agree thereto? and determined in the negative.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill concerning navigation, and to repeal the act concerning navigation, passed April 18th, 1818, were discharged from the consideration thereof, and it was postponed indefinitely.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Nicholas Jarrot was read the third time, and, the question being put on its passage, it was decided in the negative, and the bill rejected.

The bill authorizing the President of the United States to cause astronomical observations to be made, to ascertain the longitude of the Capitol, in the City of Washington, from some known meridian in Europe, passed through a Committee of the Whole; and, after a few remarks in support of it by Mr. FOLGER, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, after a division, in which 65 members, being a decided majority of those present, voted for it.

The bill to amend the several acts providing for sick and disabled seamen, and for establishing navy hospitals, coming next in order, was, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill for the relief of Daniel Seward (for refunding to him the purchase-money paid for land bought from the United States, which it has been decided in a court of law that the Government had no right to sell, and also the cost of defending his title to the same) passed before a Committee of the Whole, being supported by Mr. ROSS, of Ohio, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Perley Keyes and Jason Fairbanks. [This bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to cancel a certain bond given by the persons above named as security for Paymaster Whittlesey, a paymaster of the militia in the service of the United States, on their giving a bond in a different form—the object being to enable them to foreclose a mortgage against the property of Whittlesey, in order to indemnify them for the payment of a balance of four or five thousand dollars due from Whittlesey to the Government.]

The object of the bill having been explained by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, at the request of Mr. TRIMBLE it was reported to the House, and ordered, without objection, to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill to amend the act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis, passed through a Committee of the Whole; and, after some debate on amendments proposed to it, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of Elias Parks, made some progress therein, and had leave to sit again.

REGULATION OF IMPORTS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill "further to regulate the entry of merchandise imported into the United States from any adjacent territory," reported at the last session.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, explained the circumstances which had appeared to the Committee of Ways and Means to render the passage of the bill necessary—the practice of smuggling on parts of the line between the United States and Canada, having increased to a degree which called for the counteracting provisions embraced by the bill, which had been prepared with great care by the Committee of Ways and Means at the last session, and was supposed to be sufficient for its object.

Mr. TRACY conceived the bill would be superfluous on the statute book, as all its essential provisions were already in force in the existing revenue laws; to show which he entered into an examination of the provisions of existing laws, compared with those in the bill before the House.

Mr. TRIMBLE was in favor of the bill, supposing it possible that it might have a tendency to prevent smuggling, and being certain that it would not have a tendency to increase it. He said, however, that the dexterity of smugglers was not very easy to be defeated or counteracted. His object, however, in rising, was to inquire whether some additional provisions were not necessary for the prevention of smuggling on the Southern frontier, the temptations to which had been of late much increased by the heavy additional tonnage duty on French vessels.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that it was possible that, since this bill was prepared at the last session, circumstances might have made additional provisions necessary. With the view to the examination of this point, on motion of Mr. S., the Committee rose and reported progress, and the bill was recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means.

THURSDAY, November 30.

Two other members appeared, and took their seats, to wit: from Massachusetts EZEKIEL WHITMAN, and from Georgia WILLIAM TERRILL.

On motion of Mr. CAMPRELL, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were directed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the 27th section of the act, entitled "An act regulating the Post Office Establishment," passed the 30th day of April, 1810, as to require the Postmaster General, in any contract he may enter into for the conveyance of the mail, to stipulate with the person with whom such contract is to be made to carry newspapers, magazines, and pamphlets, other than those conveyed in the mail.

Mr. WALKER submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for placing on the pension list such persons as have, or may hereafter apply for pensions under the acts of Congress of the 18th of March, 1818, and 1st of May, 1820, who may not be found on the rolls of the respective States in which they enlisted, but who, nevertheless, may be able to adduce satisfactory proof, by their own oath or other testimony, that they did serve on the Continental Establishment in the Revolutionary war.

Mr. WALKER made a number of remarks in favor, and explanatory of the object of his motion; and, the question being put on agreeing to the resolution, it was negatived.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing the time of holding the district court of Mississippi, from the first Mondays in May and December, to the first Mondays in January and July.

On motion of Mr. CASE, the Secretary of State was directed to lay before this House such information as he may possess, or can obtain, relative to the annual amount of the fees of the clerks, district attorneys, and marshals, of the respective courts of the United States, the amount of whose fees do not appear in the "register of officers in the service of the United States;" and also the annual amount of the fees of naval officers, collectors, and surveyors of the customs, of the respective ports of the United States.

On motion of Mr. PHELPS, the Postmaster General of the United States was directed to report to this House the names of those persons who were indebted to his department on the 31st day of December, 1816, and the amount then due from each person; also the names of those who, since that time have become, and were indebted to that department on the 30th day of December last, and the amount then due from each person.

Engrossed bills of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Perley Keyes and Jason Fairbanks; and an act to amend the act, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Willis," were severally read the third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Daniel Seward was read the third time.

Mr. BALDWIN moved to lay the bill on the table, to allow further time to examine the principle it contained, doubting whether it had any example in the practice of the Government relative to grants.

The motion was opposed by Mr. ROSS, and negatived—yeas 57, nays 63.

Considerable debate then followed, on the merits of the bill, in which it was opposed by Messrs. BALDWIN and LINN, and was supported by Messrs. ANDERSON, ROSS, and BRUSH; and which ended by laying the bill, on motion of Mr. LINN, on the table.

The engrossed resolution to authorize the President of the United States to cause the necessary observations to be made to ascertain the longitude of the Capitol of the United States, was read the third time; and, after an unsuccessful motion by Mr. COCKE to lay it on the table, the question was taken on the passage of the resolution, and carried—yeas 61, nays 45; and it was ordered to be sent to the Senate for concurrence.

The House then, on motion of Mr. STORRS, went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Elias Parks, which was reported to the House, and, after a few remarks by Mr. STORRS in favor, and by Mr. WILLIAMS adverse to the bill, it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. ROSS, who voted yesterday against the bill for the relief of Nicholas Jarrot, moved to reconsider the same, with a view to recommit it for amendment. And the question to reconsider the vote was decided in the affirmative, by a vote of 53 to 47. The bill was then recommitted to the Committee on Public Lands.

THE TARIFF PETITIONS.

Mr. BALDWIN, from the Committee on Manufactures, to which have been referred the memorials of sundry inhabitants of Belfast, in Maine, and of the merchants and others of Richmond, in Virginia, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Manufactures, to whom have been referred the petitions of sundry inhabitants of Belfast, in Maine, and the merchants and others of Richmond, in Virginia, beg leave to report:

That the general object of these petitions is to remonstrate against the passage of the bills which were reported to this House at their last session, to regulate the duties on imports and for other purposes; to regulate the payment of duties on imported merchandise; and imposing a duty on sales at auction. As neither of these bills are now depending before either House of the Legislature, but have been either expressly or virtually rejected, it would, in an ordinary case, be deemed a sufficient answer to the petitions to say that their object had been already accomplished. It might too be deemed premature in a committee of this House, to whom these subjects had been referred at the present session, and who may feel it their duty to report on some of these bills, similar in their tendency to those of the last, to make any report on the matters embraced in these petitions, until the committee had agreed on recommending something for adoption. But there seems to the committee to be, in these petitions, something of a character perfectly novel, introduced in a manner, it is believed, so totally unprecedented in the legislative history of the country, as well as inconsistent with the respect due to the representatives of the nation, that it is felt to be a duty to notice them now.

In alluding to the foregoing bills, the petitioners from Belfast assert, that a repeal of the law of debenture, the abolition of drawbacks, formed a part of the system of those bills, and depict in glowing colors the ruinous effects on the commerce of the country, which would result, though they make no direct imputation of any intention.

The Richmond memorial is more explicit, as the House will observe from the following extract: "In the next place, let us inquire into the justice and policy of the prohibitory system recommended by the advocates of internal manufactures, who may be viewed, indeed, less as the advocates of manufactures, than as the enemies to foreign commerce and navigation; for, to what other purpose can they have introduced the bills to repeal drawbacks on exportations, and to abolish the credits given on duties, but to assail our commerce in the most vital manner, and eventually to destroy it?"

In considering these allegations of the petition, the committee feel great regret in being compelled to say, that they are utterly unsupported by fact, and contradicted by the bills referred to, so far as they relate to the subject of drawbacks. The present system of drawbacks and debenture was, in all its parts, retained in both the bills called the Tariff and Cash Payment, and in the latter new provisions inserted, which were intended and calculated to afford new and great facilities to the re-export trade of the country. The language of both bills was clear, explicit, and, to minds disposed to examine at all, capable of no misconstruction. One bill was reported in January, the other in March last. Both were printed by the order of the House; they excited general interest throughout the nation; were published; laboriously and fully discussed, and would seem, on the subject of drawbacks, as little open to any misconception as any measures ever brought before the public. How it has happened that those who are so much alive to these measures, who indulge fears that they would prove fatal to commerce, agriculture, and revenue, should have been so profoundly ignorant of their nature, is to the committee most inconceivable. Respect for the petitioners forbids the imputation of any other motive.

It is to be expected that opinions will be variant as to the operations of important measures; friends may be too sanguine as to their good, enemies too easily alarmed about their bad effects; there must be freedom in their discussion, both as to their tendency, the principles on which they are supported, as well as the motives of their advocates. Those who are interested have a right to speak, by petition or remonstrance to their representatives, in plain, strong, and even bold language. This right is, and ought to be, sacred in a Republic, even without the guarantee of the Constitution. Opposition, of the most decided nature, must not only be expected, but should be wished, by the friends of such measures, as the only mode by which their propriety and expediency could be in the first instance ascertained, and by which Congress would avoid the adoption of crude and ill-advised ones. As to the policy of the bills referred to, the committee forbear as well the expression of any opinion, as an examination of the reasons urged against their adoption. Should it be deemed their duty to offer them, or any of them, to the House, the occasion will be fairly presented to test the soundness of the objections, urged in the petitions with much zeal and no little feeling. But we cannot withhold the expression of our opinion, that it derogates from the respect due to this House; that, by abusing, it may impair the sacred right of petition and remonstrance, to either ignorantly or wilfully misrepresent the proceedings of any branch of the Government. It prevents the fair and legitimate action of public opinion, deceives and misleads the people, by directing their attention from what is really proposed to be adopted, to phantoms which exist only in the fears and ignorance of those who raise them. It is not for the committee to impute it as intentional; but when misrepresentation exists and spreads, its source becomes immaterial; in its effects, it equally tends to poison and inflame the minds of the people, excites causeless alarms, and creates an unfair, ungenerous hostility, which would not exist, if the subject were candidly stated and fairly explained.

Few cases ever occur which could more clearly show the bad consequences of this perversion and misstatement of the proceedings of the National Legislature. The assertion by some, and the belief by many, that it was a part of the system recommended by the Committee on Manufactures at the last session, to abolish the right of debenture and the whole system of drawbacks, would naturally create great alarm in all the commercial parts of the nation. If true, it would justify their most active opposition: the friends of commerce might fairly say, that its destruction was a leading, if not avowed object; the feelings of the people would be justly roused, and conveyed to the Legislature in the strong, if not indignant voice of those who, feeling themselves assailed in their most vital interest, would act in self-defence in repelling an injury. The House can well judge of the burst of public indignation which would have been called forth had those bills contained the provisions attributed, when their existence only in the fancy and groundless fears of the petitioners have justified them, in their own minds, in their petitions addressed to this House, in assailing the motives and intentions of one of your committees. Had the petitioners understood these bills, had they known that they did not abolish or restrict, but retained, extended, and offered new subjects to the present system of drawbacks: provided a new and more enlarged one, leaving it at the option of the merchant to avail himself of either; not prohibiting, but encouraging, the exportation of foreign produce, not by adding new, but removing existing impediments; thus, so far from destroying, aiding, and assisting this important branch of a great national interest, the committee indulge, if not the belief, at least the hope, that a tone would have been given to public feeling different from what is expressed in the spirit of these petitions. When a committee, on their responsibility to the House, recommends, when the House, on its responsibility to the nation, adopts, a system which is believed to be called for by the public exigencies, it is hoped that it is not expecting too much from those who complain, that they will view them as the acts, not of an individual, but of a public body of high trust, whose motives ought not to be questioned, at least not without even the color of truth; whose conduct, motives, public and recorded acts, should not be misrepresented; that it may be held responsible for its own conduct only, not for what exists not but in the minds of those who create, then so feelingly deprecate, their imaginary grievances; and that those who avail themselves of the right of petition should use no language which is not respectful, and make no imputations which are not true. If, with the means which this House has adopted to diffuse information on all interesting subjects, the measures which it proposes will not be examined or understood by those whom they affect, or, if understood, are misrepresented, the committee can recognise no right which they can thus have to publicly, and on its own records arraign this House for what they are pleased to call schemes, projects, and State machinery; to charge a committee with being the enemies of foreign commerce, and the design to assail, in the most vital manner, and eventually to destroy, by proposing and urging the abolition of drawbacks—a charge not only not supported, but contradicted, by the bills, the progress of which, one of the petitions says, has been witnessed with much concern.

It is our duty to listen to the voice of the people; to not only adopt such measures as may promote their welfare, but to abstain from such as impair it; but they owe a duty to us, not to impute what was not proposed—not to charge us with what was not attempted, but most solemnly disclaimed and disavowed.

So far as the petitions referred to the committee relate to matters which have been, or may be, reported on by them, they will deem it a duty to bestow on them their most respectful and serious attention; but so far as these petitions impute to this House, or its committee, a scheme which was developed and nearly matured at the last session of Congress, a part of which was designed to repeal the law of debenture, abolish drawbacks, and destroy the foreign commerce of the country, the committee owe it to themselves and the House to express their strong disapprobation of conduct which they hope has been hitherto without a precedent.

They therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures be discharged from the further consideration of so much of the petitions referred to them as relates to the abolition of drawbacks.

CLOTHING THE MILITIA.

The House, on motion of Mr. CANNON, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for clothing the militia of the United States when called into actual service.

The bill was so amended, on motion of Mr. CANNON, as to require the clothing provided for the militia, to be of such color or uniform as may be prescribed by the Legislatures of the respective States.

The bill, having been otherwise slightly amended, was reported to the House; where some debate took place on the question of concurrence in the above amendment.

It was argued, by Messrs. COBB and BRUSH, that it would introduce much perplexity in the arrangements for militia service, without producing any essential benefit.

In reply, Mr. CANNON vindicated his amendment, and, in general, defended the object of the bill, which served to place the militia, in some respect, on an equality of footing with the regular troops of the army, who are clothed, as well as fed, at the expense of Government.

Mr. GROSS, of New York, concurred in Mr. CANNON'S general views, but thought the amendment would be more properly introduced in a different part of the bill.

Mr. FLOYD wished the bill to lie on the table until a report, called for at the last session, was received from the War Department, of the number of militia who were in service during the late war, which would afford some data by which the expenditure that would arise from this bill could be estimated, which would probably amount to more than the National Treasury could satisfy. On this ground, and others, he thought the bill ought not to pass; but, if it did pass, it ought not to be without more satisfactory information on the subject, &c. Mr. F., therefore, moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. CANNON opposed this motion, fearing that the effect of it would be, by procrastination, to defeat the bill.

The question on laying the bill on the table was decided in the affirmative, by a vote of 71 to 51.

FRIDAY, December 1.

Another member, to wit: from North Carolina, WILLIAM DAVIDSON, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the State of Kentucky, purchasers of lands of the United States, stating that they have paid one or more instalments and are unable to pay the subsequent instalments as they become due, and praying for the passage of an act remitting the back interest on the several instalments prior to the time they respectively became due, and giving to the purchaser the privilege, at any time within one year after the passage of the act, of surrendering such portion of the land as he may be unable to pay for, and granting him a patent for as much land as the payments made will amount to at the purchase price, allowing the usual discounts for prompt payment; which was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, from the select committee appointed on the petition of Daniel McDuff, made a report thereon, and, by leave of the House, accompanied such report with a bill for his relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, of Connecticut, the Committee on the Judiciary were directed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the marshal of the district of Connecticut to make use of Newgate prison, in the State of Connecticut, for the purpose of confining and safe keeping any prisoner or prisoners who have been, or hereafter may be, sentenced to imprisonment and labor in any court of the United States within the district of Connecticut, for the violation of any act or acts of the Congress of the United States.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Elias Sparks having been put on its passage—

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, rose in opposition to the bill, on the ground of a defect of evidence in support of the claim, contending that the evidence was not the best that the nature of the case would admit of.

A good deal of debate ensued on this bill, in which Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, went into a minute examination of the claim of the petitioner. He was replied to by Mr. STORRS, at considerable length; and some remarks were added also by Mr. RICH in favor of the bill.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, was decided in the affirmative; and the bill was sent to the Senate for concurrence.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, gave notice that he should, on Monday, move the consideration of the resolution introduced by him to amend the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. LOWNDES gave notice that he should, on Wednesday next, move for the consideration of the resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

VACCINE INSTITUTION.

The engrossed bill to incorporate the Managers of the National Vaccine Institution, was read the third time; and, on the question of its passage—

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, moved to recommit the bill, so as to allow of its being amended in one particular, and thus obviating the only objection which he had to its passage. His object was to incorporate in the bill the words "within the District of Columbia." There was not a general agreement of opinion as to the power of Congress to establish corporations to pervade the United States; but there was no doubt of its power within the District, to which therefore he wished expressly to limit the corporate authority proposed to be conferred by this bill.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia said, he saw no unconstitutional feature in the bill, which he hoped, therefore, would be permitted to pass as it stood. The object of the bill was to aid in the eradication of the small pox from our country—an object which all must admit to be not only innocent but laudable. The gentleman who had been most earnest in asking from Congress the passage of this bill had devoted himself to this object with a perseverance seldom exceeded, and with desirable success. To enable those who took an interest in this matter to avail themselves of the donations of charitable persons in all parts of the United States, it was necessary that a company should be incorporated, with power to erect the necessary buildings.

Mr. KENT, of Maryland said, the gentleman from New Hampshire appeared to be under some misapprehension in relation to the bill first read. By its provisions, said Mr. K., the National Vaccine Institution is to be established here, and this provision renders unnecessary the gentleman's proposition. It will be recollected by the House that, some years past, the appointment of an agent for vaccination was authorized by law, with the privilege of franking his letters; and, although this measure gave some facility in the transmission of vaccine matter to the different parts of the country, yet it was found too limited in its effects for the accomplishment of an object fraught with such incalculable benefits to the community. Hence, the citizens of several of the adjacent States were induced to accept of a proposition made by Dr. Smith, to establish an institution here in the capital of the country, from whence should issue gratuitously the vaccine matter to such States, counties, or towns, as should subscribe a certain amount for the establishment and encouragement of this institution; by which means every class in society, the poor as well as the rich, would receive the matter free of expense. In six of the adjacent States $26,000 were subscribed on the 1st day of January last, and no doubt a considerable addition has been made during the present year to that sum. These subscriptions have been made to Dr. Smith, who is the agent for vaccination; and, in the event of his death, without the passage of some such bill as the one before you, would be lost to those who made them with such benevolent views. The bill does not propose to take from the Treasury one dollar, its only object is to withdraw from the hands of Dr. Smith the whole amount of those subscriptions, and place them under the control and direction of six discreet, judicious managers, who are named in the bill, and whose successors are to be appointed by the President of the United States. It has been under the hope of the securing the full benefit of such liberal subscriptions, that I have been induced to advocate the bill, and now ask for the concurrence of the House in its passage.

Mr. BURWELL, of Virginia, was opposed to the recommitment, on different ground from that taken by other gentlemen. He adverted to a construction which had been recently put upon the powers of Congress within the States, (in the case of the lotteries authorized by Congress,) and said that he believed that construction was too absurd to be entertained by many men of sense in this country, and he regarded it as very unfortunate that such a construction had been sanctioned by the names of any men of sense and character. Believing that Congress had not the power to make this law operative within the States, and that inserting the words proposed might, by implication, give countenance to what he considered the most dangerous and absurd construction ever given to the Constitution, he was opposed to limiting, by words in the bill, what he considered as already limited by the Constitution.

Mr. LIVERMORE said he was as friendly to the object of this bill as any gentleman within these walls, and he had no desire to impede its passage. But, he said, Congress have a power within the District which they have not beyond it. They have here the power of exclusive legislation; beyond it, they have not that power. Within this District, he did not know that their power was any thing less than absolute. He did not know of any restraints upon it but reason and a sound discretion. It was a question whether Congress had the power to extend a corporate authority into the States; and he did not see that the remarks of gentlemen in favor of the bill had obviated the difficulty. A corporation inhabits a house not made by man; it inhabits all space—it is everywhere and nowhere. It has no body, as it is sometimes said to have no soul. For his part he wished this charter to be restricted to the District of Columbia, where almost every anomalous thing was to be found.

Mr. MERCER, of Virginia, opposed the recommitment of the bill, on the ground that such a course would have the effect to give it a quietus for the remainder of the session, especially after the notice this morning given by Mr. LOWNDES. Mr. M. said he concurred with his colleague in his view of the recent opinion of some gentlemen learned in the law, on the subject of the powers of Congress. He did not see, however, how, by possibility, the passage of this bill could countenance that opinion. Mr. M. referred to the nature of the bill, and its unobjectionable character, as arguments in favor of its passing the House, and without recommitment.

Mr. Cook suggested a modification of the question, so as to propose a recommitment of the bill to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report the specific amendment suggested by Mr. LIVERMORE.

Mr. LIVERMORE having assented to putting the question in this shape—

It was so put and negatived.

And the bill was passed, and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

MISSOURI EXPEDITION.

Mr. COCKE, of Tennessee, rose to present a proposition to the House. When looking into the expenditures of the last year, he said he found the account of Colonel James Johnson for transportation furnished the expedition ordered up the Missouri river. The gross amount of it, said Mr. C. is $256,818 15. Several items in this account require at least explanation. I find the sum of $333 37 per day, for forty days, charged for the detention of steamboat expedition, amounting in the whole to $13,333 33½. In addition to this, $200 per day, for thirty-six days, is claimed for the detention of steamboat Johnson, amounting to the sum of $7,200. The sum charged for detention alone of those two boats, for less than one month and a half, is $20,633 33½. He called the attention of the House, also, to some other items in this account. It appeared, he said, that three hundred officers and soldiers procured a passage, on board Colonel Johnson's boats, from Belle Fontaine to Council Bluffs, about four hundred miles. at $50 each, making the sum of $15,000 for passage alone. The sum demanded by Colonel Johnson for detention of boats and passage of three hundred men employed on this expedition, is $35,533 33½. By what means the residue of the Missouri detachment found their way to Council Bluffs, said Mr. C., I am at a loss to determine, but no doubt on terms equally advantageous to the public. Knox, Haldiman & Co., contracted and furnished transportation to the Council Bluffs for the sum of $5 50 per hundred pounds. Colonel Johnson charges, for transportation to the same place, $16 25 per hundred pounds; almost three times the amount paid Knox, Haldiman & Co. for similar services. I am informed those charges have been allowed, and the account liquidated and paid. I trust the information is erroneous. Permit me to ask, was not Colonel Johnson contractor to furnish supplies as well as transportation? Why, then, the delay? Why pay a large amount for detention? This, Mr. C. said, is the expedition the President himself takes very great interest in the success of, and is willing to take great responsibility to insure it. This is the expedition that was to protect the frontier and fur trade, acquire for the United States lasting influence over the savages of Missouri, raise corn in Summer, improve navigation in Winter, and result in saving to Government, in four years, the sum of $42,485 84. The estimated cost for transportation of this favorite project, as reported to Congress at the last session, was $162,994. The sum claimed by Colonel Johnson, and he was told actually paid, is $256,818 15. To ascertain with certainty the amount actually paid for transportation and detention of boats on the Missouri expedition, and the reasons why it was paid, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House what sums of money have been actually paid to Colonel James Johnson, on account of transportation furnished the expedition ordered up the Missouri river; and also what sums have been paid him for detention of steamboats or other incidental charges; whether any difference of opinion existed between the Department of War and said Colonel J. Johnson, relative to the value of transportation or other charges exhibited by him against the United States; if any differences existed, how were they adjusted; if by reference, who were the referees; what was their award, and what evidence was submitted to them, on which they formed their award.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, said he did not profess to know any thing on the subject of this resolve but what he was about to state. The account first preferred by Colonel James Johnson, he had understood, had been thought too high. Some discussion on that point took place between him and the Secretary of War, and he authorized his friend and brother to assent to a reference of the points in dispute to arbitrators, to be chosen, one by each party, the third by those two. Three arbitrators were accordingly chosen—gentlemen of the first standing and of the highest respectability, who passed upon the accounts. They reduced very considerably the amount claimed by Mr. Johnson, and the amount paid to him was the amount awarded in his favor by the referees. Thus much he had heard, and, as an impression adverse to him might be drawn from the gentleman's remarks, though not intended by him, Mr. T. said he had thought it proper to say thus much in behalf of Colonel Johnson, who had ever been believed to be an honest man.

Mr. COCKE said, it was far from him to question the honesty of any man whatever, in what he had said. He disclaimed any such intention. But it seemed extraordinary to him how the allowance referred to had been made without the authority of Congress. On looking into Colonel Johnson's contract, he did not find that any provision was made for allowance for the detention of steamboats. He had understood, too, that Col. James Johnson was a contractor, not only for transportation, but for supplies of provisions. If this were true, Mr. C. said, he should like to know how it did happen that the boats were detained, and whether it was in consequence of the neglect of Colonel Johnson to furnish the provisions in proper time. Not being included in the contract, application ought to have been made to this House to authorize the allowance which has been made to Colonel Johnson without its authority. Mr. C. said he should make no observations with regard to this arbitration, which was spoken of. If the matter had been referred to these exalted arbitrations, let the House know it. Why refuse the information which it was desirable to acquire in relation to it? The resolution, he said, was predicated on accounts transmitted to Congress at the last session, and he did not see why there should be any wish on the part of the gentleman from Kentucky to oppose its adoption.

Mr. LOWMEES remarked, that the gentleman from Tennessee must have mistaken the gentleman from Kentucky, if he supposed there was, on his part, or on that of any other member, any objection to the object of this resolution calling for information. There could be no objection to it. But, Mr. L. said, he submitted it to the House and to the gentleman from Tennessee, whether, in calling for information on any subject, it was proper to accompany that call with animadversions on the conduct of those whose conduct could only be properly judged when the information itself was before them. Mr. L. added another remark or two of the same tone as the preceding, which were not distinctly heard by the reporter.

On motion of Mr. RICH, with the consent of Mr. COCKE, the resolution was amended so as to require an account also of the causes of the detention of the steamboats.

Mr. TRIMBLE rose to say, that he did not intend to object to any information which might be sought for by the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other member of the House. It was not his habit to do so; and it was not his disposition to do so on the present occasion. On the contrary, he said he was sure the inquiry would meet with the approbation of even Colonel James Johnson, could his wishes be consulted. Without knowing the fact, Mr. T. said, he thought it quite likely that Colonel Johnson may have thought that he, and not the Government, had a right to complain of the manner in which his accounts were liquidated. Mr. T. said he should not have opened his lips on this subject, had he not thought that the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee might—though he was sure the gentleman could not possibly intend it—give a color to an imputation on the character of Colonel Johnson.

Mr. COCKE rejoined in a few words more, in the course of which he said he was sorry that any gentleman should suppose that he wished to cast an imputation on any man. It was not so, he said; he wished to ascertain what were the facts in the case referred to, without any personal views or motives, &c.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolve, and agreed to, without a dissenting voice.

MONDAY, December 4.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, NATHANIEL SILSBEE, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. SILSBEE presented a petition of the President and Directors of the United States Naval Fraternal Association, for the relief of the families of deceased officers, praying for an act of incorporation for the said association; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the petition of the children and representatives of the late General Baron de Kalb, presented on the 10th of December, 1819, was referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. FORREST, the House proceeded to consider his motion for requiring information from the War Department respecting certain loans of gunpowder, &c.; and the same, having been modified by striking out the preamble, was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DARLINGTON, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to report to this House the amount of fines certified to the Comptroller of that department, to have been imposed upon the militia of Pennsylvania, for neglect of duty, during the late war with Great Britain; the amount of said fines which has been levied and collected by the marshals of the respective districts in that State, or their deputies; and the amount thereof which has been actually paid into the Treasury of the United States; also, what proceedings, if any, have been instituted for the recovery of moneys thus collected within said districts, and not yet received at the Treasury.

Mr. MERCER submitted the following:

Resolved, That President of the United States be requested to lay before this House any correspondence that he does not deem it inexpedient to disclose, which may have existed between the Executive of the United States and the Governments of any of the maritime Powers of Europe, in relation to the African slave trade.

The question thereon, being taken without debate, was agreed to without a division; and a committee was ordered to be appointed to present the same to the President.

Mr. EUSTIS, of Massachusetts, after some introductory remarks, in the course of which he contrasted the old system of the Pension Establishment with that which had more recently prevailed, advantageously to the former, proposed the following resolve:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims be instructed to report a bill, providing that, from and after the 4th day of March next ensuing, no officer, soldier, seaman, marine, or other person whatsoever, shall be placed on the pension list of the United States, except by virtue of a law in which the name of the pensioner shall be inserted, together with the amount of pension to which he shall be entitled.

The resolution being read—

Mr. LOWNDES rose, not to object to the principle of the resolution, thinking it probable that the long experience of the mover would enable him to suggest valuable improvements on the present system, but to suggest, as the resolution was affirmative, and not proposing inquiry merely, that, with a view to deliberation, it should lie on the table one day.

Mr. EUSTIS assenting to this course, the resolution was, after a few words from Mr. RHEA, indicative of hostility to it, ordered to lie on the table.

MACKEREL FISHERY.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bill: A bill for enrolling, and licensing, and granting allowances to ships or vessels to be employed in the mackerel fishery, and for the government of persons concerned therein.

Be it enacted, &c., That all acts and parts of acts now in force for the enrollment, and licensing of, and granting allowances to, ships or vessels employed in the bank and other cod fisheries, and for the government of persons concerned therein, be, and the same are hereby, extended, in all their provisions and limitations, to vessels that shall hereafter be employed, and the persons who shall hereafter be concerned in the mackerel fishery; excepting only so much of said acts as fixes the rate of allowance to vessels exclusively employed in the bank and other cod fisheries: and that, from and after the passing of this act, there shall be paid, on the last day of December annually, to the owner of every fishing boat or vessel, or his agent, by the collector of the district where such boat or vessel may belong, that shall be qualified agreeably to law for carrying on the mackerel fishery, or the cod and mackerel fishery, and that shall actually have been employed in the mackerel, or in the cod and mackerel fishery, at sea, for the term of four months at least of the fishing season next preceding, which fishing season is accounted to be from the last day of February to the last day of November in every year, on each and every ton of such boat's or vessel's burden, according to her admeasurement, as licensed or enrolled, three dollars: Provided, That the allowance aforesaid, on any one vessel, for one season, shall not exceed two hundred dollars.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any vessel is intended to be employed exclusively in the mackerel fishery, or in the cod and mackerel fishery, the words "mackerel fishery," or the words "cod and mackerel fishery," as the case may be, shall be inserted in the license by the collector granting the same; and that as much of the act entitled "An act laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries," passed July 29, 1813, as grants a bounty on pickled mackerel exported, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The bill was twice read, and committed.

CASE OF MATTHEW LYON.

Mr. McLEAN, of Kentucky, from the committee appointed on the memorial of Matthew Lyon, made a report thereon, accompanied with a bill for his relief; which, by leave of the House, was presented, read the first and second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The report is as follows:

The petitioner states that, in violation of that provision of the Constitution of the United States of America which says "Congress shall make no law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press," Congress, in July, 1798, passed the act commonly called the sedition law; that, some time previous to the passage of this bill, there appeared in the Philadelphia Federal papers a violent attack upon his character, extracted from the Vermont Journal, charging him with many political enormities, particularly with the high crime of opposing the Executive; that he wrote a reply to this charge in Philadelphia, on the 20th of June, 1798, and on the same day put the letter, directed to the editor of the said Vermont Journal, into the post office at Philadelphia, twenty-four days before the passage of the sedition law. For the publication of this letter he was indicted in October following, in the circuit court of the United States in the Vermont district. In the same indictment, he was charged with publishing a copy of a letter from an American diplomatic character in France to a member of Congress in Philadelphia; also for aiding, assisting, and abetting in the publication of said letter.

He states said letter was written by Joel Barlow to Abraham Baldwin, then a member of Congress. He denies that he printed said letter, or aided or abetted in the printing of it; but, on the contrary, that he used his endeavors to suppress it, by destroying the copies which came into his possession. He states that, owing to the political party zeal which prevailed in the United States at that time, much unfairness was used in the trial, both by the marshal in summoning the jury, and the judge who presided, in his instructions to them, and thereby a verdict of guilty was returned against him by the jury; and upon that verdict the court sentenced him to pay a fine of $1,000, the costs of suit, be imprisoned four calendar months, and until the fine and costs were paid. He states that, by virtue of said judgment, he was arrested and confined in a dungeon, the common receptacle of thieves and murderers, fifty miles distant from the place of his trial, although there was a decent roomy jail in the county in which he lived, and in the town where the trial was had, which jail the Federal Government had the use of; that much severity was exercised towards him during his imprisonment; that he languished in the loathsome prison more than six weeks in the months of October, November, and December, in the cold climate of Vermont, without fire, before he was allowed, at his own expense, to introduce a small stove, or to put glass into the aperture which let in a small glimmer of light through the iron grate.

H. OF R.

Case of Matthew Lyon.

DECEMBER, 1820.

He states that he is poor, and asks Congress to refund to him $1,000, the fine which he has paid, the costs of suit, for one hundred and twenty-three days' pay as a member of Congress, while he was unconstitutionally detained from a seat in that body, reasonable damages for being suddenly deprived of his liberty, put to great expense, and disabled from paying that attention to his concerns which, in other circumstances, he would have been allowed to do, and such interest on those sums as public creditors are entitled to.

Your committee state that the prosecution against the said petitioner, the judgment, imprisonment, and payment of $1,000, the fine, and $60 96, the costs of suit, are proved by a copy of the record of proceedings in said cause, which is made a part of this report. The committee are of opinion that the law of Congress under which the said Matthew Lyon was prosecuted and punished was unconstitutional, and therefore he ought to have the money which has been paid by him refunded; but, should they be mistaken as to the unconstitutionality of this law, yet they think there are peculiar circumstances of hardship attending this case which call for relief. Your committee, therefore, ask leave to report a bill.

The President of the United States to all who shall see these presents, greeting :

Know ye, that among the pleas of our circuit court of the second circuit of the United States, in the Vermont district, there is a certain record remaining, in the words following, to wit :

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Vermont District, to wit :

Pleas of the circuit court of the said United States, at their term begun and held at Rutland, within and for the said Vermont district, on Wednesday, the 3d day of October, in the year of our Lord 1798, and of the independence of the United States the twenty-third, before the honorable William Patterson, esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the honorable Samuel Hitchcock, esq., district judge within and for the said Vermont district, and judges of said circuit court, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

United States versus Matthew Lyon.

Be it remembered that, at a term of the circuit court of the said United States, begun and held at Rutland, within and for the district aforesaid, on the third day of October, in the year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and ninety-eight, and of the independence of the said United States the twenty-third, before the honorable William Patterson, esq., one of the associate justices of the Supreme Court of the said United States, and the honorable Samuel Hitchcock, esq., district judge within and for the said district of Vermont, judges of the said circuit court, according to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, the grand jurors within and for the body of said district of Vermont, to wit: Eli Cogswell, Nathan Pratt, David Osgood, Ozias Fuller, Royal Crafts, Abner Mead, Gideon Horton, Abraham Gilbert, Ebenezer Worster, John Mott, Thomas Hammond, Adgate Lothrop, John Penfield, Ebenezer Hopkins, Brewster Higly, Zadock Remington, Abijah Brownson, and Joel Culver, good and lawful freeholders of the said district, then and there empannelled, sworn, and charged, to inquire, for the said United States, and for the body of the district aforesaid, did present, that Matthew Lyon, of Fairhaven, in the said district of Vermont, being a malicious and seditious person, and of a depraved mind and wicked and diabolical disposition, and deceitfully, wickedly, and maliciously contriving to defame the Government of the United States, and with intent and design to defame the said Government of the United States, and John Adams, the President of the United States, and to bring the said Government and President into contempt and disrepute; and with intent and design to excite against the said Government and President the hatred of the good people of the United States, and to stir up sedition in the United States, at Windsor, in the said district of Vermont, on the 31st day of July last, did, with force and arms, wickedly, knowingly, and maliciously write, print, utter, and publish, and did then and there cause and procure to be written, printed, uttered, and published, a certain scandalous and seditious writing, or libel, in form of a letter, directed to Mr. Spooner, [meaning Alden Spooner, printer and publisher of a certain weekly newspaper, in Windsor aforesaid, commonly called Spooner's Vermont Journal,] signed by the said Matthew Lyon, and dated at Philadelphia, on the 20th day of June last; in which said libel of and concerning the said John Adams, President of the United States, and the Executive Government of the United States, are contained, among other things, divers scurrilous, feigned, false, scandalous, seditious, and malicious matters, according to the tenor following, to wit: "As to the Executive, [meaning the said President of the United States,] when I shall see the effects of that power [meaning the executive power of the United States, vested by the Constitution of the United States in the said President] bent on the promotion of the comfort, the happiness, and accommodation of the people, [meaning the people of the United States,] that Executive [meaning the President of the United States] shall have my [meaning the said Matthew Lyon's] zealous and uniform support. But whenever I [meaning the said Matthew Lyon] shall, on the part of the Executive, [meaning the said John Adams, President of the United States,] see every consideration of public welfare swallowed up in a continual grasp for power, in an unbounded thirst for ridiculous pomp, foolish adulation, or selfish avarice; [meaning that, on the part of the said John Adams, President of the United States, every consideration of the public welfare was swallowed up in a continual grasp for unconstitutional power, and in an unbounded thirst for ridiculous pomp, foolish adulation, and selfish avarice;] when I [meaning the said Matthew Lyon] shall behold men of real merit daily turned out of office, for no other cause but independency of sentiment; [meaning that men of real merit, holding offices under the laws and Constitution of the United States, were daily, by the said John Adams, as President of the United States, turned out of office for the cause of having independency of spirit;] when I [meaning the said Matthew Lyon] shall see men of firmness, merit, years, abilities, and experience, discarded in their applications for office, for fear they possess that independence, and men of meanness preferred, for the ease with which they can take up and advocate opinions, the consequence of which they know but little of; [meaning that men of firmness, years, merit, ability, and experience, were, by the said John Adams, as President of the United States, in violation of the duties of his said office, neglected in appointments to office under the laws and Constitution of the United States, and discarded in their applications for such offices and appointments; and that men of meanness, who are unfit for the exercise of such offices, under the laws and constitution of the United States, were, by the said John Adams, as President of the United States, preferred to such offices and appointments, on account of the ease with which they took and advocated opinions, of the consequences of which they were ignorant;] when I [meaning the said Matthew Lyon] shall see the sacred name of religion employed as a State engine to make mankind hate and persecute one another, I [meaning the said Matthew Lyon] shall not be their humble advocate;"] [meaning that the sacred name of religion was, by the said John Adams, in his capacity of President of the United States, employed as an engine of State to make mankind hate and persecute each other:] to the great scandal and infamy of the said John Adams in his capacity of President of the United States, and to the great scandal and infamy of the said Government of the said United States. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do say that the said Matthew Lyon, at Windsor aforesaid, on the 31st day of July aforesaid, did, knowingly, wickedly, deceitfully, and maliciously, with intent and design to defame the said Government of the United States, and the said John Adams, President of the United States, and to bring the said Government and President of the United States into contempt and disrepute with the good people of the United States, and to excite against them, the said Government and President of the United States, the hatred of the good people of the United States, and with intent and design to stir up sedition within the United States against the Government thereof, write, print, utter, and publish, and cause and procure to be written, printed, uttered, and published, for the purpose aforesaid, the said false, feigned, scandalous, and malicious writing and libel aforesaid, containing, among other things, the said divers scurrilous, false, feigned, scandalous, seditious, and malicious matters aforesaid, in contempt of the good and wholesome laws of the United States, to the evil and pernicious example of others in like case offending against the statute of the United States in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States.

And the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do further present, that the said Matthew Lyon, being a malicious and seditious person, and of a depraved mind, and of a wicked and diabolical disposition, and also deceitfully, wickedly, and maliciously contriving to defame the Government of the said United States, and with intent and design to defame the said Government, and with intent to defame John Adams, Esquire, President of the United States, and with intent to defame the Senate of the United States, being one branch of the Congress of the United States, and to bring the said Government, President, and Senate into contempt and disrepute, and to excite against the said Government, President and Senate the hatred of the good people of the United States, and with intent and design to stir up sedition within the United States, did, at Fairhaven, in the said district of Vermont, on the 1st day of September now last past, with force and arms, wickedly, knowingly, and maliciously write, print, utter, and publish, and then and there did cause and procure to be written, printed, uttered, and published, a certain false, feigned scandalous, and seditious writing, or libel, entitled "Copy of a letter from an American diplomatic character in France to a member of Congress in Philadelphia," in which said writing, or libel, of and concerning the said Government of the United States, and the said President and Senate of the United States, and of and concerning the speech of John Adams, Esquire, then President of the United States, and of and concerning the answer of the said Senate to the said speech, are contained, among other things, divers scurrilous, feigned, false, scandalous, seditious, and malicious matters, according to the tenor following, to wit: "The misunderstanding between the two Governments [meaning the Governments of the said United States and France] has become extremely alarming; confidence is completely destroyed; mistrusts, jealousy, and a disposition to a wrong attribution of motives are so apparent, as to require the utmost caution in every word and action that are to come from your Executive, [meaning the Executive Government of the United States]—I mean if your object is to avoid hostilities. Had this truth been understood with you [meaning the people of the United States] before [the] recall of Monroe, [meaning James Monroe, the late Ambassador from the United States to the Republic of France,] before the coming and second coming of Pinckney, [meaning Charles C. second coming of Pinckney, [meaning Charles C. Pinckney, one of the Envoys Extraordinary from the United States to the said Republic;] had it guided the pens that wrote the bullying speech of your President, and the stupid answer of your Senate at the opening of Congress, in November last, [meaning the speech of the said John Adams, as delivered by him to both Houses of the Congress of the United States at the opening of their session in November last, and the answer of the Senate, being one of the Houses of the said Congress, to the said speech,] I should probably have had no occasion to address you this letter," [meaning the said writing, or libel, last mentioned.] "We [meaning the people of France] wondered that the answer [meaning the answer to the said speech] of both Houses [meaning both Houses of the Congress of the United States] had not been an order to send him [meaning the said John Adams, President of the United States] to a mad-house;" to the great scandal and infamy of the said John Adams, in his said capacity of President of the United States, to the great scandal and infamy of the said Senate, being one of the Houses of the Congress of the United States, and to the great scandal and infamy of the Government of the said United States. And so the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do say that the said Matthew Lyon, with force and arms, at Fairhaven aforesaid, in the district aforesaid, on the 1st day of September aforesaid, did, knowingly, willingly, wickedly, and maliciously, and with intent, and design to defame the said John Adams, President of the United States, and the said Senate, being one of the Houses of the Congress of the United States, and the said Government of the United States, and to bring the said Government, President, and Senate into contempt and disrepute with the good people of the United States, and to excite against them, the said Government, President, and Senate of the United States, the hatred of the good people of the said United States, and with intent to stir up sedition within the said United States against the Government thereof, aid, assist, and abet in the maliciously writing, uttering, and publishing, for the purposes aforesaid, the said false, feigned, scandalous, and malicious writing and libel last aforesaid, containing, among other things, the said divers scurrilous, false, feigned, scandalous, seditious, and malicious matters aforesaid, in contempt of the good and wholesome laws of the United States, to the evil and pernicious example of others in like case offending, contrary to the form, force, and effect of the statute of the United States in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States.

Whereupon, the marshal of the district aforesaid is commanded forthwith to apprehend the said Matthew Lyon, if to be found within his district, and him safely keep, to answer to the charges whereof he here stands indicted.

And afterwards, to wit, on the sixth day of the same October aforesaid, at Rutland aforesaid, before the court aforesaid, here cometh the said Matthew Lyon, under the custody of Jabez G. Fitch, Esq., marshal of the district aforesaid, and by the said marshal being brought, in his own proper person, to the bar of the said court here, was forthwith demanded, concerning the premises in the said indictment above specified and charged upon him, how he will acquit himself thereof; he, the said Matthew Lyon, saith that he is not guilty thereof, and for trial puts himself upon the country; and Charles Marsh, Esquire, attorney for the said United States within and for the district aforesaid, who prosecutes for the said United States in his behalf, doth the like.

Therefore, let a jury of good and lawful freeholders of the district aforesaid, on the eighth day of the same October aforesaid, at Rutland, in the district aforesaid, thereupon here come before the court aforesaid, by whom the truth of the matters aforesaid may be better known—who are not of kin to the said Matthew Lyon—to recognise, upon their oath, whether the said Matthew Lyon be guilty or not guilty of the charges of which he stands indicted as aforesaid; because, as well the said Charles Marsh, esquire, who prosecutes for the said United States in his behalf, as the said Matthew Lyon, have put themselves upon that jury for trial of said issue.

And afterwards, to wit, on the same eighth day of October aforesaid, at Rutland, in the district aforesaid, before the same court aforesaid, came as well the said Charles Marsh, Esquire, who prosecutes for the said United States in this behalf, as the said Matthew Lyon, in his own proper person; and the jurors of the jury aforesaid, by the said Marshal for this purpose empanelled and returned, to wit, John Ramsdel, Jabez Ward, John Hitchcock, jun., Bildad Orcutt, Andrew Leach, Daniel June, Joshua Goss, Philip Jones, Josiah Harris, Ephraim Dudley, Moses Vail, and Elisha Brown, who, being called, came, and being elected, tried, and sworn to speak the truth of and concerning the premises, upon their oaths say that the said Matthew Lyon is guilty of the charges of which he stands indicted aforesaid, in form aforesaid, as by the indictment aforesaid is supposed against him. And, upon this, it is forthwith demanded of the said Matthew Lyon, if he hath any thing further to say wherefore the said court here ought not, on the premises aforesaid, and verdict aforesaid, to proceed to judgment against him, who nothing saith. And afterwards, to wit, on the ninth day of the same October aforesaid, at Rutland, in the district aforesaid, before the court aforesaid, came the said Matthew Lyon, in his own proper person.

Whereupon, all and singular the premises being seen, and by the judges of the court here fully understood, it is considered and ordered by the court that the said Matthew Lyon be imprisoned four calendar months; that he pay a fine of one thousand dollars, and the costs of this prosecution; and that he stand committed until this sentence be complied with. Costs of prosecution taxed at sixty dollars and ninety-six cents.

Judgment entered this ninth day of October, A. D. 1798.

OHIO BOUNDARY.

On motion of Mr. Ross, of Ohio, the House proceeded to the consideration of a resolution submitted by his colleague, Mr. BRUSH, at the last session of Congress, for inquiring into the expediency of making a survey of the northern boundary of the State of Ohio.

On this resolution there was some debate, the course of which only can be briefly stated, as follows:

Mr. McCoy wished to know whether the State of Ohio was to bear the expense of the survey; otherwise he should be opposed to it.

H. of R.

State of the Finances.

DECEMBER, 1820.

Mr. ROSS stated the existing difficulties which make a survey necessary. The officers of the State, and those of the United States in the Territory of Michigan, both claimed jurisdiction over a considerable strip of land; the consequence of which was, that the authority of each was put at defiance there, &c.

Mr. SIBLEY, of Michigan, was opposed to the resolution, because he wished the House to act, in preference, upon a report on this subject, made by the Committee on Public Lands at the last session, prescribing a course which he thought correct, and to which he proposed calling the attention of the House hereafter.

Mr. BEECHER and Mr. BRUSH both entered at some length into a defence of the claim of the State of Ohio, and in favor of the proposition before the House; contending that, in the report of the committee of the last session, the claims of Ohio had not been sufficiently regarded, &c.

On the question to agree to the proposition, as revived by Mr. ROSS, it was decided in the negative. So the motion was lost.

STATE OF THE FINANCES.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report on the state of the Treasury; and, on motion of Mr. STORRS, three thousand copies thereof were ordered to be printed for the use of the House. The report is as follows:

3. Of the estimates of the public revenue, and expenditures for the year 1821.

In forming an estimate of the receipts into the Treasury for the year 1821, the amount of revenue bonds outstanding on the 30th day of September last, the sum due for public land, the ability and disposition of the community to purchase, and especially the quantity and quality of the land intended to be exposed at public auction in the course of the year, present the data upon which the calculations must be made. As a portion of the duties which accrue in the fourth quarter of the present year, and in the first and second quarters of the next, form a part of the receipts into the Treasury for the latter year, the amount received will exceed or fall short of the estimate, by the difference between the duties which actually accrue in those quarters, and are payable within the year, and the amount at which they had been estimated.

The receipts into the Treasury may also considerably exceed or fall short of the sum estimated, in consequence of the issue of a greater or less amount of debentures payable during the year 1821, than had been estimated.

The degree of punctuality with which the revenue bonds are discharged, upon which the estimate is formed, must necessarily affect the amount that will be received into the Treasury.

If the accruing revenue of the present and two succeeding quarters should exceed that of the corresponding quarters of the present and last years; if the amount of the debentures which may be issued and made payable, so as to affect the receipts of the year, should be less than that of preceding years since the peace, compared with the gross amount of duties secured within those years, respectively; and if greater punctuality in the payment of the revenue bonds now outstanding should be observed than during the last-mentioned period, the receipts from the customs will exceed the estimates now presented; and they will fall short of it should all these contingencies be unfavorable, as has been the case during the present year.

The revenue bonds outstanding on the 30th of September last are estimated at $18,770,000. Of this sum $3,130,000 are in suit, of which about $1,250,000 will not be collected on account of the insolvency of the debtors; leaving the amount of bonds outstanding, upon which collections are to be made, estimated at $17,520,000. The amount of duties secured during the first, second, and third quarters of the year 1820, is estimated at $13,350,000; and that of the whole year may be estimated at $16,500,000. The amount of debentures outstanding on the 30th of September last, and payable during the year 1821, is estimated at $1,162,114 16, which is subject to be increased by the amount issued in the present quarter, and during the whole of the ensuing year, chargeable upon the revenue of that year. The average annual amount of debentures, bounties, and allowances, and expenses of collection chargeable upon the revenue, has been ascertained to be nearly equal to fifteen per cent. of the average annual amount of the duties upon imports and tonnage, which accrued from the year 1815 to the year 1819, inclusive.

If this proportion be applied to the revenue bonds outstanding on the 30th of September last; and if the receipts from the tonnage of vessels, and upon duties secured during the present and the two succeeding quarters, are assumed to be equal to any deficiency resulting from the want of punctuality in the discharge of the outstanding bonds, the receipts into the Treasury for the year 1821, from this source of revenue, may be estimated at $14,000,000.

The receipts into the Treasury from the public land, during the first three quarters of the present year, are estimated at $1,124,645 32, and those of the entire year will probably not much exceed $1,600,000.

The receipts from that source, during the year 1821, will probably not exceed those of the present year, if no incentive to greater punctuality, or inducement to make prompt payment, should be presented to the public debtor in the course of the present session of Congress.

The balances of internal duties and direct tax still outstanding are so considerable as to justify an estimate of some extent in calculating the receipts of the ensuing year, if the difficulty of enforcing payment in those States where the largest amount is due were not known to be great. Under these circumstances, the receipts from that source, for the ensuing year, are estimated at $100,000.

According to the foregoing data, the receipts into the Treasury for the ensuing year may be estimated as follows, viz:

Customs	- - - - -	$14,000,000
Public lands, exclusive of Mississippi stock		1,600,000
Arrears of internal duties, direct tax, and incidental receipts	- - - - -	100,000
Third instalment from the Bank of the United States	- - - - -	500,000
Bank dividends which will accrue during the year, estimated at five per cent.	- - - - -	350,000

Making the aggregate amount of - $16,550,000

The appropriations for the same period are estimated as follows, viz:

1. Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous	$1,769,850 04
2. Military Department, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian department, military pensions, and arrearages prior to the 1st of January, 1817	- - - 4,585,352 61
3. Naval Department	- - - 2,420,594 56

Making an aggregate of - $8,775,797 21

But, to determine the amount of the charge upon the Treasury for the service of that year, the following additions must be made, viz:

1. Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous, the sum of $1,500,000; being an amount of appropriations for the present and preceding years unexpended, and which may be expended during the year 1821; and the sum of $5,477,777 76, payable on account of the interest and reimbursement of the principal of the public debt during that year.

2. The unexpended balances of appropriations for the War Department, under the different heads already enumerated, and which have been deducted from the estimates, or not included in them, (as in the case of Revolutionary pensions, because the balance of that appropriation is estimated to be equal to the expenditure on that object during the ensuing year,) amounting, together, to $2,507,267 63; the annual appropriation of $200,000 for arming the militia; and the Indian annuities, not embraced by the estimates, amounting to $152,575.

3. The annual appropriation of $1,000,000, for the gradual increase of the Navy, which will expire in the year 1823; and an unexpended balance on the same account, which may be expended in 1821, of $1,750,000.

DECEMBER, 1820.

State of the Finances.

II. OF R.

According to the foregoing data, the expenditure of the year 1821, and which is chargeable upon the Treasury during that year, may be estimated as follows, viz:

1. Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous	$3,269,850 04
2. Public debt	5,477,777 76
3. Military department, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian department, military and revolutionary pensions, arrearages prior to the 1st of January, 1817, and arming the militia, and Indian annuities	7,445,195 24
4. Navy Department, including the sum of $1,000,000 for the gradual increase of the Navy	5,170,594 56

Making an aggregate charge upon the Treasury, for the year 1821, of	$21,363,417 60
To which add the balance against the Treasury, on the 1st of Jan'y, 1821	2,638,169 77

Making - - - 24,001,586 77

Leaving a balance of $7,451,586 77 beyond the estimated means, for which provision must be made. [This balance is reduced by a subsequent estimate.]

To determine whether a deficiency to this, or any other amount, will occur in succeeding years, is extremely difficult. The data furnished by the fiscal operations of the Government since the peace, must be principally relied upon in making the calculations necessary to arrive at any general result upon this subject.

It has been ascertained that the net revenue which has accrued from imports and tonnage, from the year 1815 to 1819, inclusive, has amounted to $120,260,052 46. If this be divided by the number of years in which it accrued, the result will be an average annual revenue of $24,052,000. But the revenue which accrued in 1815 greatly exceeded not only that of any year previous to the war, but that of any year since that epoch. It is also admitted that the quantity of produce on hand, at the close of the war, especially of cotton and tobacco, considerably exceeded the amount of the crop of those articles made during the preceding year. The ability of the community, therefore, to purchase an increased amount of foreign articles in the year 1815 exceeded, in a corresponding degree, that of subsequent years. It has also been ascertained that the importation of foreign articles during the present year has been considerably less than in any year since the peace. To form an estimate of the average annual revenue which may accrue from imports and tonnage during the next four years, that will approximate towards accuracy, it will be necessary to embrace in the calculation the revenue which accrued from the year 1814 to 1819, inclusive, amounting to $124,510,414 05, and that which shall have accrued in the year 1820, estimated at $14,000,000, making the aggregate sum of $138,510,414 05, which gives the sum of $19,787,202 as the average annual revenue for those seven years.

Other views, derived from the fiscal operations of the Government, will be found to accord with this result. The average product of the duties upon imports and tonnage, which accrued from the year 1801 to 1807, inclusive, may be stated at $13,640,000; and that which accrued from the former period to 1813, inclusive, amounted to the annual sum of $11,570,000. The increase of population in the United States has been estimated at thirty-four per cent. in ten years; if the increase of consumption has corresponded with that of population, the revenue of the year 1820, according to the result furnished by the first seven years, would exceed $20,000,000, and would fall but little short of $17,000,000, according to the data furnished by the whole period. During the former period, the principal States of Europe were involved in wars; which not only gave to our shipping the principal part of the carrying trade, but created an unusual demand for every article of exportation, and greatly enhanced their value.

Any estimate founded upon the average revenue of those years, the duties upon imports remaining the same, would, most probably, not be realized; but as these duties were considerably increased in 1816, the objections to such an estimate are, in some degree, diminished. From the year 1808 to 1813, inclusive, the United States were engaged in a state of commercial or actual warfare. The disadvantages to which their commerce was subjected by that warfare more than counterbalanced the peculiar advantages it enjoyed in the seven years immediately preceding. An estimate for the next four years, founded upon an average of the whole term, would more probably fall short of than exceed the sum which would be received into the Treasury, notwithstanding the duties were higher during two years of that term than at present.

In the investigation of a subject of such complexity, affecting so deeply the interest of the community, every fact and circumstance connected with it ought to be considered. Since the year 1807 new interests have arisen, which claim a prominent place in this consideration. From time immemorial, household manufactures have existed in every part of the United States. The mechanical arts, (those branches of manufacture without which society, even in a very imperfect state of civilization, could not exist, (though differing in some degree from those properly denominated household, have long existed in the United States. Since the year 1807, those branches of manufacture have been greatly extended and improved. Others have been established, and a large amount of capital has been invested in manufacturing establishments, which promise to furnish, in a short time, an ample supply of cotton and woollen manufactures, and most of those of iron, glass, and various other articles of great value.

As commerce has been properly defined to be an exchange of equivalent value, it is probable that by the failure on our part to receive from foreign nations the accustomed supply of those articles which can now be produced in our domestic establishments, the articles which they have been accustomed to receive from us will lose something of the value which they would otherwise have commanded, until new channels of intercourse shall be discovered, and different articles of merchandise shall be substituted for those formerly received.

The capacity of a nation to consume foreign articles depends upon the value of its exports, and not upon its ability to furnish every article of primary or secondary necessity. The precious metals are never imported into any country when commodities which will command a profit can be obtained for importation. Giving full weight to the fact that cotton, woolen, iron, and various other articles which are now furnished by our domestic establishments, will be hereafter received from foreign nations only to a small amount, $17,000,000 of revenue may be assumed as the minimum, and $20,000,000 as the maximum, which will be annually received from imports and tonnage during the next four years. The decrease which has occurred in the revenue in the last and present years furnishes no ground to distrust the correctness of the foregoing conclusion. The customs produced, in 1815, a net revenue of $35,306,022 51; in 1816, $27,484,100 36; and in 1817, $17,524,775 15. This last year was considered, at the time, as the period of greatest reaction. Accordingly, in 1818 the net revenue from the customs amounted to $21,828,451 48.

The multiplication of banks, the state of the currency, and the high price which all exportable articles commanded until the end of 1818, strongly invited to extravagance of every kind, and particularly in the consumption of foreign merchandise. The resources of individuals had been, by these seductions, in a great degree anticipated during the first years which succeeded the peace. The sudden reduction in the value of all exportable articles which occurred about the commencement of 1819, not only prevented in a great degree further purchases, but rendered the discharge of engagements previously contracted impracticable. The pressure thus produced upon the community reacted upon the vendors of every species of merchandise, whether foreign or domestic, who, without thoroughly investigating the cause of their distress, have sought for relief in measures calculated rather to aggravate than alleviate the public embarrassment.

The issue and payment of a larger amount of debentures in the present year in proportion to the exportations of the last, the increased amount of specie and diminished amount of foreign merchandise imported during the present year, and the ready sale of foreign and domestic articles now in the market, show that the importation of foreign goods is upon the eve of being regulated by the demand for them for consumption.

It has been stated that the receipts from public land during the year 1821 cannot be estimated at more than $1,600,000, unless some greater incentive to punctuality or inducement to make prompt payments should be offered by the measures which may be adopted in the course of the present session of Congress. The act of the 24th of April last, which abolished credit on all purchases of land, and reduced the minimum price from 200 to 125 cents per acre, furnishes, it is respectfully conceived, equitable ground for legislative interference in favor of purchasers under the ancient system. By that system, the price could be reduced to 164 cents per acre by prompt payment. If the act abolishing credit had fixed the minimum price at 164 cents instead of 125 cents, no equitable ground for legislative interference would exist. It is not contended that the vendor of an article, under ordinary circumstances, does an injury to a purchaser by subsequently selling the same article to others at a low rate. But if he has in his possession such a quantity of the article sold as to enable him for an indefinite time to determine the price of the article, he affects the interest of every previous purchaser by such reduction, who may be constrained, from any cause whatever, to sell that article. The extent of the national domain will, for ages, enable the Government to determine the price of unimproved land similarly situated. It is admitted that the Government has been induced to adopt this measure by the most grave considerations. The most prominent of these was the necessity of preventing the further increase of a debt, then about $22,000,000, strongly affecting the interests and feelings of a great number of citizens. If its increase was an object of deep solicitude, its diminution, by an act of grace founded upon equitable principles, will be in strict accordance with the motives in which that measure originated. Difficulties may occur in adjusting the details of such a measure, unless it be presented as a simple act of grace. Under this point of view, it should be confined in its operations to the debtors of the Government for public lands, and should affect them only to the extent of the debts which they may respectively owe.

During the excessive circulation of bank notes not convertible into specie, and to which the Government, from necessity, for some time gave currency, and the high price which every description of domestic produce commanded, large quantities of public land were sold at public auction at prices greatly beyond their real value. In many instances, the first payment which the Government has received could not be obtained by the purchaser, even if he were able to convey the land in fee-simple. The propriety of legislative interference to change the relation between debtor and creditor, for the benefit of either, may be questioned. Circumstances, however, may arise, which will influence an upright and benevolent creditor to relax his demands, and to grant relief to his debtor voluntarily, which he might resist as an act of power. Such is respectfully conceived to be the situation of the Government in relation to the purchasers of public lands, who, in a moment of infatuation, have engaged to pay for a portion of the national domain a sum greatly beyond its value, and which never will be paid.

In all cases of this kind, the forfeiture of the sum already advanced will inevitably occur, if relief to some extent be not granted.

In conformity with the foregoing views, the following propositions for the relief of the purchasers of public lands, and for the purpose of increasing the payments into the Treasury in the ensuing year, are respectfully submitted, viz:

1st. That every purchaser of public land be permitted, on or before the 30th of September next, to abandon any legal subdivision of his purchase, and that the payments made upon the part abandoned be applied to the discharge of the instalments due upon the remainder; the right to abandon in no case to involve any repayment by the Government to any purchaser. In all cases the part retained to be in the most compact form that the situation of the whole quantity purchased will permit.

2d. The difference between the former and present minimum price for cash payments being equal to 23.78 per cent. on the former, it is respectfully proposed, that on payment of the whole purchase money for any tract of land on or before the 30th day of September next, a deduction of 25 per cent. shall be made, and that any interest which may have accrued to the United States in such cases shall be remitted. An act of greater liberality, and which would still further increase the receipts into the Treasury during the next year, would be to allow a deduction of $37\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on all such payments, which is equal to the difference between 200 and 125 cents.

DECEMBER, 1820.

State of the Finances.

H. OF R.

3d. That all sums which may be due by purchasers of public lands, who shall not avail themselves of the preceding conditions, shall be payable in ten equal annual instalments, without interest, provided that such payments shall be punctually made upon the several days in each successive year upon which the purchases were respectively made. Any failure in making such payment to revive the original terms and conditions of sale.

If these or analogous provisions should be adopted, the payments from the public land, during the year 1821, will be greatly increased; the debt due on that account greatly diminished; and the revenue resulting from that source acquire, in future years, a more uniform character.

If, then, be assumed that the revenue which will accrue from the customs will be equal to the mean sum between seventeen and twenty millions of dollars, the annual revenue for the four succeeding years may be estimated as follows, viz:

Customs	-	-	-	-	-	$18,500,000
Public lands	-	-	-	-	-	2,500,000
Bank dividends at six per cent.	-	-	-	-	-	420,000
Incidental receipts	-	-	-	-	-	80,000

Making an aggregate amount of - $21,500,000

But if the annual receipts from the customs shall be estimated for the next four years at the average sum of $17,000,000, the annual revenue for that period will be equal to $20,000,000.

The annual expenditure for the same period may be estimated as follows, viz:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous	-	$2,000,000
Public debt	-	5,477,000
War Department, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian department, military and revolutionary pensions, arming the militia, and arrearages prior to the 1st of January, 1817,	-	5,850,000
Naval Department, including $1,000,000 for the permanent increase of the navy	-	3,420,000

Making the aggregate amount of - $16,747,000

The balance of the Sinking Fund, after paying the interest of the funded debt, and providing for the annual reimbursement of the six per cent. deferred stock, has not, in this estimate, been considered as a charge upon the Treasury before the year 1825, as the price of the public stocks precludes the possibility of purchase within the rates prescribed by law.

This estimate is below that which is required for the year 1821, but it is believed to be less than the annual expenditure which will be required for the next four years. According to this estimate, the means will exceed the indispensable expenditure, during that period, by $3,253,000.

After the year 1823, the annual expenditure upon the navy will be diminished by $1,000,000. The expenditure of the Government after that year, including the entire appropriation for the public debt, is estimated as follows, viz:

Civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous,	-	$2,000,000
Public debt,	-	10,000,000

Military Department, including fortifications, ordnance, Indian Department, military and Revolutionary pensions, arming the militia, and arrearages prior to the 1st of January, 1817,

-	-	-	-	5,850,000
Naval Department,	-	-	-	2,420,000

Making the aggregate amount of $20,270,000

which, after the year 1824, would leave an annual deficit of $270,000.

If this sum should not be met by the annual increase of revenue, resulting from the increase of population during those and succeeding years, and the increased consumption of foreign articles resulting therefrom, it may be supplied by a corresponding reduction in those items of expenditure which depend absolutely upon the will of the Legislature, unconnected with the existing laws regulating the permanent expenditure.

It is therefore respectfully submitted, that it is inexpedient to resort, at this time, to the imposition of additional taxes upon the community. The condition of the currency in several of the States of the Union furnishes strong inducements to abstain from additional taxation at this time. The obligation of the Government to receive the notes of the Bank of the United States, without reference to the place where they are payable, has given to them their universal currency. All notes issued south and west of Washington have, in consequence of the state of exchange between those places and the commercial cities to the east of this place, centred in those cities. The bank has, consequently, found itself constrained to direct those branches to refuse to issue their notes, even upon the deposit of specie. The effect of these causes combined has been the exclusion from circulation, in all the States west and south of the seat of Government, of the notes of the Bank of the United States and its offices. In several of those States there is no sound paper circulation. To resort to internal taxation, under such circumstances, would be to require of the citizens of those States what it will be impossible for them to perform. Wherever paper circulates as money, which is not convertible into specie, it circulates to the exclusion of specie and of paper which is convertible into gold and silver coin. In all such places, the payment of direct or internal taxes in specie, or in the notes of the Bank of the United States will be impracticable. Preliminary to a resort to internal taxation of any kind, the charter of the Bank of the United States ought to be amended, so as to make the bills of all the offices of the bank, except that at the seat of Government, receivable only in the States where they are made payable, and in the States and Territories where no office is established. The effect of this modification would be to make the notes of the offices of the Bank of the United States, except the office in this District, a local currency, which will enter and continue in the local circulation of the States in which they are issued. The notes thus issued will render the local circulation of the States sound, and furnish to the citizens the means of discharging their contributions to the Government. This measure will also place the State institutions to the south and west of this city in a more eligible situation in relation to the offices of the Bank of the United States, by enabling them to adjust their accounts with those offices by the exchange of notes, instead of liquidating their balances by the payment of specie. Should it, however, be judged expedient by the Legislature to lay additional burdens upon the people, for the purpose of meeting the existing or any probable future deficiency, it is respectfully submitted that the importation of foreign spirits be prohibited, and that a duty upon domestic spirits, equal to the amount of that now collected upon foreign spirits, and to such deficiency, be imposed on the distillation and sale of domestic spirits. In any event, a resort to loans to the extent of the deficiency of the year 1821 will be indispensable.

Of the sum of $3,000,000, authorized by the act of the 15th May last to be raised by loan, $2,000,000 have been obtained at a premium of two per cent., upon stock bearing interest at the rate of six per cent. per annum, redeemable at the will of the Government, and $1,000,000 at par, upon stock bearing interest at the rate of five per cent. per annum, redeemable at any time after the 1st day of January, 1832. There is no just reason to doubt that any sum which may be necessary to be raised by loan, can be obtained upon terms not less favorable; but, as it is probable that the surplus of the revenue, after satisfying all demands upon the Treasury authorized by existing laws, during the years 1822, 1823, and 1824, will be equal to the redemption of any debt which may be contracted in 1821, it is respectfully submitted that the President of the United States be authorized to borrow from the Bank of the United States, or from other banks or individuals, the sum which may be necessary for the service of that year, at par, and at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, redeemable at the will of the Government.

All which is respectfully submitted.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

CLAIMS FOR LOSSES BY WAR.

Mr. STRONG, of New York, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to ascertain and report to this House the amount of individual claims upon the United States, in favor of American citizens, growing out of the last war with Great Britain, the Creek war, and the Seminole war; designating the classes of the claims, and the names of the claimants, together with the sum or sums which, in their opinion, shall be equitably and fairly due to each, so far as the same may be practicable; and, also, upon the expediency of providing for the same by issuing scrip, receivable in payments for the public lands, or in such other manner as the committee may deem more advisable.

Mr. ANDERSON objected to so much of this resolution as proposed to refer to a select committee what was expressly the duty of one of the standing committees, viz: an inquiry into the expediency of allowing claims. He had no objection that so much of the resolution as proposed an inquiry into the extent of these claims should go to a select committee, as proposed.

To this objection Mr. STRONG replied. He thought, where a general class of cases was proposed to be provided for, the expediency of such a provision would, very properly, fall within the duty of a special committee, rather than of the standing committee, which had already so much business before it.

Mr. SIMKINS, considering the subject of this resolution as of much importance, wished to have an opportunity of deliberating upon it, and, therefore, moved to lay it on the table for further consideration.

Mr. GROSS, of New York, in opposing the motion to lay the resolution on the table, said that it appeared to him a great change had taken place in the mode of proceeding on this subject. There was a time when claims of this sort were thought just, and promptly allowed; then came a time when they were inquired into, but relief refused—now, gentlemen would not even examine the claims—which was the only object of this proposition, &c.

Mr. ANDERSON replied that the change if any, was in the mode of bringing the claims before the House. If the gentleman from New York, or any other, would bring any claim or claims before the House, in the usual manner, he would find no objection to the examination of them. Mr. A. admitted that it was desirable to know the amount of these claims, and for that purpose was very willing that a select committee should be charged with the inquiry.

After a few more remarks, from Mr. GROSS, the motion to lay the resolution on the table was decided in the affirmative by a small majority.

COMMERCE OF THE BLACK SEA.

Mr. FULLER, of Massachusetts, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law such means as may be necessary to obtain for the citizens of the United States the navigation of the Euxine sea, and a participation of the commerce of its ports and dependencies.

Mr. F., after remarking on the expediency of affording to commerce, under present circumstances, all the facilities in the power of the Government to bestow, went on to say that our commerce with Russia, it was well known, was, at present, almost entirely carried on through the Baltic sea, which, it was equally well known, was closed against navigation for the greater part of the year by the severity of the climate. The Euxine sea, he said, afforded much greater facilities, by means of the rivers which fall into it, for carrying on the trade with Russia. But, not having any agent there, we have no means of procuring the permission to pass the straits of the Dardanelles. From the information of others, however, Mr. F. said, he had no doubt, that the requisite permission could be obtained by asking it in a proper form and manner. The free intercourse with the Euxine would, he said, be of much advantage to us in another point of view. At present, all our commerce with Turkey is carried on through Smyrna. Several ports of the Dardanelles, Mr. F. said, would be more convenient for this purpose than Smyrna. Upon the whole, he thought it quite advisable to have an inquiry made into this subject through the medium of a committee of the House.

Mr. STEVENS, of Connecticut, said, in reference to Mr. FULLER's intimation that permission to pass the straits could be obtained if asked in a proper manner, that he presumed the agent who asked it must go with something in hand, and suggested the propriety of ascertaining, before they went further, what would be the cost of this project.

Mr. RHEA suggested that the mover would, perhaps, get more directly at his object by moving at once to request the Executive to send a Minister to Turkey.

The motion of Mr. FULLER was then agreed to without a division.

TUESDAY, December 5.

A message from the Senate informed the House that they have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens and Austin L. Sands, legal representatives of Richardson Sands, deceased, and others," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, containing the information required by the resolution of the 23d ultimo, in relation to the execution of the act of the 1st of May, 1820, amendatory of the act for the relief of certain persons engaged in the land and naval service of the United States, in the Revolutionary war; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating sundry statements, rendered in obedience to the resolution of this House of the 13th of May last, requiring him to lay before the House at the present session, a report of the quantity of land sold under the provisions of the act passed on the 24th of April, 1820, entitled "An act making further provision for the sale of the public lands;" as, also, the name of the purchaser; the number of acres sold to each individual, or company, or body corporate; the sum per acre for which the same was sold, distinguishing that which shall be sold at private, from that which is sold at public sale; which letter and statements were ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in obedience to a resolution of the House, a statement from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, of the number of claims for bounty land which remain unsatisfied, the aggregate number of acres necessary to satisfy them, and the period when they will be ready.

The SPEAKER also communicated to the House a letter from the Postmaster General, transmitting, in obedience to a resolution of this House, a list of postmasters who are also contractors for carrying mails, the amount of their compensation, &c.

Both communications, with the accompanying documents, were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill, from the Senate, for the relief of Nicholas Jarrot, with sundry amendments, which were read and agreed to, and the bill ordered to a third reading.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, it was—

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury Department be directed to communicate to this House the latest return made to that Department of the general statement of the Bank of the United States and its offices of discount and deposit.

On motion of Mr. SIMKINS, it was—

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to lay before the House a particular statement of the expenses of the Army of the United States, from the end of the late war to the present year, including the estimates for 1821, designating the expenditures in each branch of the army for each year, with such explanations as may be necessary to render the statement clear and explicit. Also, that he lay before this House the amount of balances, if any have accrued, in each year, from the moneys appropriated for the support of the army; in what way such balances have accrued, and how they have been disposed of or appropriated.

WEST POINT ACADEMY.

Mr. CANNON moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House, as soon as is practicable, a statement showing the aggregate amount that has been expended on the Military Academy at West Point, in the State of New York, from the establishment of the same to the present time, in the erection of buildings, barracks, repairs and materials for the same; also, the aggregate amount that has been expended in pay, subsistence, and clothing, of the teachers, officers, and cadets, that are or have been in said academy, up to the present time; also, the aggregate amount that has been expended on the quartermaster's department attached to said institution, for wood and distributing the same, forage, transportation, stationery, including articles used in the drawing department, books, mathematical instruments, printing, and all other contingencies, up to the present time; also, the number of cadets that have been educated in said academy, since the first establishment, from the District of Columbia, also the number from each State and Territory in the Union, also the number of cadets now in said academy from the District of Columbia, and from each of the States and Territories respectively; also, the number who have received an education at said academy who are in the Army and Navy of the United States, the appointment each holds, and the District, State, or Territory, they are from; and also the number of orphans, if any, of those who have fallen in the defence of their country, or died in its service, who have been educated in said academy, or are now cadets in the same, and the District, State, or Territory, each is from.

Mr. LITTLE wished to correct the resolution in one particular, in which he conceived there was a misapprehension. The mover was certainly mistaken in supposing that the teachers or cadets of the Military Academy were clothed by the Government; the cadets, Mr. L. stated, received pay, out of which they clothed themselves, and as it was not the fact that either they or the teachers of the academy were clothed by the Government, he did not wish such an idea to go abroad. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would modify his resolution by omitting the call relative to clothing.

Mr. CANNON referred to a report of the Secretary of War, made at the last session, on the subject of the academy, to show that the Government was charged with clothing for it. An item of the report referred to, stated a disbursement of five hundred and some odd dollars for clothing furnished the establishment at West Point. If, however, the Government provided no clothing for that institution, the Secretary would report the fact to the House, so that the feature in the resolution which was objected to be conceived had better be retained. Mr. C. added a few remarks as to his motives in moving this resolution. Economy in the public disbursements was imperiously called for by the state of our finances, and, among the other national establishments, he wished to see if any retrenchment could be made in the Academy at West Point.

Mr. LITTLE replied, that there was a part of the corps of engineers employed at West Point, who were regularly enlisted, as other soldiers, and were in the same manner clothed by the Government; it was the clothing for these soldiers, no doubt, which formed the item in the report referred to. The resolution called for the expenses of clothing the teachers and cadets, and, he repeated, as no such expense existed, he wished the form of the resolution to correspond with the fact, and therefore moved that the feature he objected to should be stricken out.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, the resolution ought not to go forth in such a shape as to show ignorance of the facts on the part of the House, and, as there was certainly no such provision for the cadets as clothing, (for he presumed five hundred dollars would go very little way towards clothing two hundred and fifty cadets,) he hoped the motion of his colleague (Mr. LITTLE,) would be agreed to, and the resolution be modified.

Mr. CANNON assented to the modification proposed by Mr. LITTLE; and, thus amended, the resolution was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The House then, on motion of Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, resumed the consideration of the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, in relation to the election of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States and members of the House of Representatives.

Mr. REID, of Georgia, rose in opposition to the resolution, and, in a speech of near an hour, submitted his views of the impolicy of amending the Constitution in the feature contemplated, especially by substituting the mode proposed by the resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, replied to Mr. R.; and went into a defence, considerably at large, of the expediency of the amendment contemplated by the resolution.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, followed, and went into a general argument against the proposed amendment of the Constitution.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, advocated the resolution, and replied, at some length, to the arguments of Messrs. REID and BARBOUR.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, spoke a short time against the resolution.

The question was then taken on ordering the resolution to be engrossed and read a third time, and was decided in the affirmative, by yeas and nays. For the resolution 103, against it 59, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen of New York, Anderson, Archer of Maryland, Archer of Virginia, Baker, Ball, Bateman, Beecher, Bloomfield, Brush, Bryan, Buffum, Burton, Butler of New Hampshire, Butler of Louisiana, Campbell, Cannon, Clagett, Cobb, Cocke, Cook, Crafts, Crowell, Culbreth, Culpeper, Cushman, Davidson, Dewitt, Dickinson, Eddy, Edwards of Connecticut, Eustis, Fay, Floyd, Folger, Foot, Ford, Fuller, Gross of New York, Guyon, Hackley, Hall of New York, Hendricks, Hooks, Jackson, Johnson, Kendall, Kent, Kinsey, Kinsley, Little, Lincoln, Linn, Livermore, Lowndes, Maclay, McCullough, McLean of Kentucky, Mallary, Meigs, Mercer, Monell, Montgomery, R. Moore, T. L. Moore, Morton, Moseley, Neale, Nelson of Massachusetts, Parker of Massachusetts, Plumer, Rankin, Rich, Richards, Richmond, Robertson, Russ, Sawyer, Shaw, Silsbee, Simkins, Sloan, Smith of New Jersey, Smith of Maryland, B. Smith of Virginia, Smith of North Carolina, Stevens, Street, Strong of Vermont, Swearingen, Tomlinson, Tracy, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Van Rensselaer, Walker, Warfield, Wendover, Whitman, Williams of Virginia, and Williams of North Carolina.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbot, Alexander, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Tennessee, Baldwin, Barbour, Brevard, Brown, Burwell, Case, Clark, Crawford, Darlington, Dennison, Earle, Edwards of Pennsylvania, Gross of Pennsylvania, Hall of North Carolina, Hazard, Hibshman, Hill, Hostetter, Jones of Virginia, Jones of Tennessee, Lathrop, McCoy, McCreary, Marchand, Meech, Metcalf, S. Moore, Murray, Nelson of Virginia, Newton, Overstreet, Parker of Virginia, Patterson, Phelps, Philson, Pinckney, Reed, Rhea, Rogers, Ross, Sergeant, A. Smyth of Virginia, Storrs, Strong of New York, Tarr, Terrell, Tompkins, Trimble, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, and Wallace.

The SPEAKER announced that the question was decided in the affirmative, and, demanding when it was the pleasure of the House to have the resolution read a third time—

Some discussion arose on the question whether, as the Constitution required that such a proposition should be supported by two-thirds of both Houses to enable it to pass, a less number than two-thirds could order the resolution to a third reading. Two-thirds of the House not having voted for the third reading of the resolution, Mr. COBB made the point of order, and Messrs. CULPEPER, LOWNDES, SMITH of Maryland, RHEA, and LIVERMORE, spoke upon it.

The SPEAKER decided that the rules and practice of the House recognised the principle that two-thirds of the votes were required on the final passage of a resolution proposing to amend the Constitution; but that any intermediate question might be carried by a majority of the House. No appeal being taken from the decision of the Speaker—

H. OF R.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time to-morrow.

To obtain a full vote on the passage of this resolution, which Mr. SIMKINS deemed of high importance, being no less than a proposition to amend the Constitution, he gave notice that at one o'clock to-morrow he should move a call of the House.

WEDNESDAY, December 6.

Another member, to wit: from Delaware, WILLARD HALL, appeared and took his seat.

Mr. BEECHER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to alter the time of holding the district court in the district of Mississippi; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Private Land Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing further time to the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on continental establishment, their heirs or assigns, entitled to bounty lands, within the tract reserved by the State of Virginia, between the Little Miami and Sciota rivers, to complete their locations.

On motion of Mr. TOMLINSON, the Committee of Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to require that the collector of the customs for the district of Sandusky shall reside at Portland, in the district aforesaid.

On motion of Mr. BEECHER, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of revising the laws establishing the fees of the district attorney for the district of Ohio, and as respects the fees of the marshal and clerk of the circuit and district courts for the district of Ohio.

On motion of Mr. STRONG, of New York, the House proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 4th instant, respecting the claims growing out of the last war with Great Britain, the Creek war, and the Seminole war; and the question recurred, on the motion of Mr. ANDERSON, to amend the said resolution, by striking out the words following: "together with the sum or sums which, in their opinion, shall be equitable, and fairly due to each, so far as the same may be practicable. And, also, upon the expediency of providing for the payment of the same, by issuing scrip, receivable in payment for the public lands, or in such other manner as the committee may deem more advisable." And, being taken, it passed in the affirmative. The question was then put to agree to the resolution, as amended, and determined in the negative.

The report made on the 12th of May last, by a select committee appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what, further provision may be necessary to give effect to the provisions of the Treaty of Brownstown, in the Territory of Michigan, was referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of Ebenezer Stevens and Austin L. Sands, legal representatives of Richardson Sands, deceased, and others," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Nicholas Jarrot," was read the third time, and passed.

DUTY ON FRENCH TONNAGE.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce, reported the following bill:

SEC. 1. Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the act, entitled "An act to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships and vessels," passed May 15, 1820, shall not extend to, or operate upon, any French ship or vessel that shall have entered into any port within the jurisdiction of the United States prior to the 30th day of September, 1820.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury, after deducting a tonnage duty equal to that paid by every French ship or vessel which entered the ports within the jurisdiction of the United States prior to the passage and operation of the act, entitled "An act to impose a new tonnage duty on French ships and vessels," passed May 15, 1820, from the tonnage duty collected from French ships and vessels, by virtue of the above recited act, between the first day of July, 1820, and the 30th day of September following, be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay and refund the remainder of such tonnage duty, free from costs and charges, to any person or persons who shall have authority to receive the same.

The bill was twice read and committed.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE.

Mr. FOOT, of Connecticut, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the act for the better government of the Navy of the United States, as authorizes the infliction of corporal punishment by stripes or lashes; and also to provide for the punishment of any officer or private in the Navy, who shall send or accept a challenge to fight a duel, in the same manner as is provided in the 25th and 26th articles of the first section of the act for establishing rules and articles for the government of the armies of the United States.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said if he understood the resolution, it proposed a measure which would have the effect altogether to destroy the efficiency of the Navy.

Mr. FOOT replied that the resolution proposed only an inquiry, the object of which was the expediency of establishing an uniformity in the mode of governing the Army and Navy. In the act of 1812, regulating the articles of war, corporal punishment in the Army had been abolished. Whether it was expedient to establish the same rule for the government of the Navy, or not, was a matter for inquiry, which might be ascertained under this resolution.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, moved to lay the resolution on the table; which motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The engrossed resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States with respect to the mode of election of Representatives to Congress and Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, was read a third time.

Mr. OVERSTREET, desiring further time to make up his mind with regard to this question, which he considered as one of the first magnitude, on which he had not yet satisfied himself, moved to postpone the further consideration of the resolution to Monday next.

This motion, the question being put, was determined in the negative.

Mr. ANDERSON, after expressing his entire assent to that part of the proposition now before the House, which went to establish a uniform mode of election of Electors, intimated that he entertained some doubts as to the remaining part of it, which proposed the same rule in respect to Representatives to Congress, and on that point he desired explanation. His objection to it was, that to pass it would be legislating uselessly. By the Constitution, as it now stands, Congress have the power to declare that Representatives to Congress shall be elected in all the States by districts. If in this respect the States have not, in our opinion, done right, said Mr. A., we can, by an ordinary law, do it for them; and therefore he said he could see no reason why the fundamental charter need undergo any revision on this point. That a great object only can justify an alteration or amendment of the Constitution, was a proposition which, he said, every gentleman would assent. If no gentleman satisfied his scruples on this subject, Mr. A. said, he should move a recommitment of this resolution to a committee, with instructions to strike out that part of it to which he had taken exception.

Mr. LINN then rose and said that, for the very reason that the gentleman had given as an objection to it, he wished the postponed amendment to succeed. It was true, that Congress possessed the power to district the States, or otherwise provide the mode of elections of Representatives to Congress. But he had ever considered it a most dangerous power—a power liable to the greatest abuses. They might require every voter in the State to repair to the seat of government of the State to vote, or lose his vote entirely. With regard to the Electors, too, he had always believed it to be the true spirit and intention of the original constitution, that the people should choose the Electors. Instead of that, we now found that, in several of the States, the Legislatures choose the Electors, and the people have nothing to do with it. For these reasons, he was in favor of the resolution; and he should hope that it would receive, not only a Constitutional majority of votes, but that it would pass unanimously.

Mr. SIMKINS, with a view that all gentlemen might have an opportunity of giving a decisive vote on this question, and not be obliged to vote before they were fully prepared, moved that the resolution be postponed to this day week.

Mr. EUSTIS supported the postponement, on the ground of courtesy towards gentlemen who declared that they were not satisfied as to the vote they ought to give.

Mr. FLOYD was ready to postpone this resolution on the ground now stated—the more readily as the public interest did not require its passage at this day in preference to a later day in the session. For himself, Mr. F. said he should be unwilling to give this Government any more power than it already possesses. He should be unwilling to make this Government more strong than it is. He had voted yesterday for the third reading of this resolution, but it was under a conviction that, in doing so, he was voting to give no more power to the General Government than it already had. When our Constitution was framed, its authors were aware that difficulties might arise in respect to the election of Representatives, and they gave the power to Congress which it now has. If it does possess the power to district the States, the Constitution cannot do more if amended as proposed; but, the advantages of putting this provision into the body of the Constitution are, that in times of difficulty, if violent parties should arise, and we cannot expect otherwise, the large States may, to effect some ambitious purpose, change their own institutions, and Congress, partaking of the same spirit, may repeal or enact laws directing the mode of election of Representatives as may best suit their purposes. But, if such a clause as is now proposed be inserted in the Constitution, such a power in this House, capable of being so dangerously employed, would be destroyed.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, said, the simple objects which he had in view, were, first, in regard to the election of President, to give the minority as well as the majority of the people of every State, a chance of being heard. With regard to the election of Representatives, he well knew that the Constitution gave to Congress the power of prescribing the mode, and it was to guard against that very power that he wished the amendment to prevail. He was unwilling, for one, that Congress should ever exercise that power; because they might, as had been suggested, exercise it in a despotic and dangerous manner.

The motion for postponement to Wednesday next was agreed to—85 to 47.

MISSOURI.

The House having, on motion of Mr. LOWNDES, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, having been read—

Mr. LOWNDES rose, and delivered a speech of nearly two hours in length, of which the following is a brief sketch:

The first observations of Mr. L. were lost to the reporter, from the confusion arising from members changing their seats, &c. When Mr. L.'s observations became audible, he was speaking of the difficulty under which he should labor, in what he had to say, from being obliged to direct his observations to arguments not yet urged, and in regard to which he must depend upon what he had heard in other quarters, and upon conjecture.

In the outset, he said, he was met by an objection of a general nature, applicable to other cases as well as that now presented to the House. He could not doubt, he said, from what he had heard, that there were members of the House who considered themselves bound by the same principles which influenced them at the last session, to vote at this session against the resolution declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union. On this point, he addressed himself to the moderation and good sense of the House—of those gentlemen particularly who believed the constitution framed by Missouri to be inconsistent with the principles of our Government, to say, whether it was not inconsistent with the character of our Government, and of all Governments, that questions once decided by the legitimate authority of the country should be considered as yet open, or inconclusive? Did not such a course of reasoning lead to the conclusion that all the acts of the Government were binding only on the majority who voted for them? That all compacts are void, for example, as to the minority which refuses to sanction them? Suppose, in regard to a debt incurred in carrying on a war, a party subsequently in power were to say—we did not vote for the debt; we did not support the war; we are not bound to pay the debt. Would such an argument be entitled to respect? Take, for an example, the debt incurred in the late war with Great Britain: was it not essential to the character of the nation that that debt should be considered obligatory as well upon those who approved, as on those who disapproved, the purpose for which the debt was contracted? And were all the members of this and the other House not equally bound by the act of the last session respecting Missouri? Whether we ought or ought not to have given to the people of Missouri the power to form a constitution and State government, we have given it. Whether or not we individually wished Missouri to form a constitution, the authority to do so was given by Congress. The constitution was formed, and Congress were now asked to declare that it was so. For himself, Mr. L. went on to say, he believed that the law of the last session gave Missouri a right to form a constitution; and that, having done so, she is now a State.

If you look at the course which Congress has pursued hitherto, it will be found that, on elevating territories from the grade and dependence of a territorial government, Congress has done no more than emancipate them from its control. On doing this, said Mr. L., you have reserved nothing like an authority to remand them to their colonial condition. You have determined, in such case, by the act of allowing the territory to form a constitution, that, for certain purposes, she is an independent State. In the act of the last session, it would be found, on referring to it, there was no difference between the mode of legislation in Missouri, and that which had occurred in regard to the oldest of the States admitted into the Union. Comparing that act with other acts for the admission of States, it would be found to confer the same powers and impose the same restrictions. It was impossible to distinguish, in any manner, between the power which had been given to Missouri and that which had, in like circumstances, been granted to the oldest of the new States. Mr. L. went on to quote the cases of admission of States into the Union. He referred to that of Ohio. The act for her admission was couched in the broadest terms, requiring the convention, as usual, first to determine the question whether it was expedient to form a constitution. Although the mere act for the admission of a territory into the Union does not make her a State, inasmuch as her acceptance of the offer is required, yet, at the moment that she declares that it is expedient to form a constitution—at that precise moment she acquires all the rights of a State. The people of Missouri, as of every other admitted State, at that moment acquired rights which it is not competent for the legislature of this country—which it is not competent, upon the principles which we hold sacred, for any legislature under Heaven to divest them of.

Before he proceeded further to refer to the practice of former times, Mr. L. said he would notice an argument which he had heard suggested, which was in some degree a verbal one. It is said that the words of the law in regard to the admission of Missouri are prospective; that the Constitution says that Congress may admit new States into the Union; that no authority but Congress can admit them; that Congress has not admitted Missouri into the Union; and that it is necessary she should now address Congress and obtain its consent to her coming into the Union. It is true, Mr. L. said, that the law provides that Missouri "shall" be admitted; that is, prospectively as to the date of the law. It is true, also, that new States can be admitted into the Union only by Congress. But that admission may be from the time the law passes, or on the performance of a condition, whatever that condition may be. There was nothing, Mr. L. argued, in the law of the last session, to show that the act of admission was not complete on the part of Congress when that law passed, although it did refer to a future time. That this was a just construction of the matter, he said, was obvious by a reference to former examples. In the case of Kentucky, for example, her admission into the Union was deferred, by the act of Congress authorizing it, he did not know how many months, but more than a year after the passage of the act. Nothing more was necessary, after the passage of the act for the admission of Missouri, than a lapse of time sufficient for the determination of the people to be ascertained, whether they chose to form a constitution or not.

But his strongest argument, Mr. L. said he was aware, must be derived from the course pursued by Congress in former times. He disclaimed any particular devotion to precedent; but, in a time when parties were as firmly marshalled as they were on this subject at the last session; when the true import of the Constitution was contested by nearly equal parties on this floor; when geographical lines were observable in the division of opinion, it was wise, it was becoming, to look to what had been the practice in former times, when no causes existed so likely to disturb and mislead the sober judgment. Every man ought to examine the record of those days, and rather lean to a decision consistent with them.

Referring, then, for illustration, to the case of Ohio, after she had formed a constitution and State government, although no resolution had passed declaring her admission into the Union, it became necessary to pass a law to extend over her territory the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States; and the preamble to that law recites that the people did, on a certain day, form a constitution and State government, and give a name, whereby the said State has become one of the United States—that is, by the act of forming a constitution. And such, Mr. L. said, was the principle on which the United States had always acted. But, he said, the preamble was interesting, not only because it confirmed his argument in the main, but also marked the time and circumstance which, in the opinion of Congress at that time, made a people a State, viz., the day on which a constitution is formed, and the act of forming it.

The proof afforded by other precedents, however, that a people became a State on forming a constitution under the authority of Congress, was still less equivocal than that which had been cited. In every instance, and, as far as he knew, without an attempt at resistance, whenever such a constitution has been formed by a Territory, they have not only been considered a State, but the elections which they have made under their constitution have been held to be good. If, by the act of forming a constitution, they have not become independent States, how has it happened that, without a single exception, they have elected their own governors, judges, &c., and their acts have been Constitutional and valid? Can it be said of all these cases that Congress, knowing these territorial people had usurped the powers of States, would have silently submitted to it? Their having done so was the strongest proof that every one of these States had, in the opinion of Congress, of the State governments, and of the people, the powers which they exercised.

Mr. L. said he knew there were persons who believed that the people of Missouri Territory do not become a State until, by an act posterior to the formation of their constitution, Congress declares their admission. Mr. L. said he could not admit this. It was disproved by the uniform language of precedents. The acquiescence of Congress in their elections of Senators and Representative to Congress disproved it. These elections, held previous to the submission of their constitutions to Congress, had uniformly been held valid. Who are Senators? They are deputed by the States composing the Union to represent them in Congress. If States only can vote for Senators, the uniform practice of recognising all such elections as are subsequent to the adoption of a constitution, is conclusive enough that they who choose them were already in the condition of States. In the case of Kentucky, indeed, without any declaratory resolution, without any thing like a formal acknowledgment of her being a State, but by virtue of an act declaring, prospectively, that when she had formed a constitution she should be a State, she was admitted without further legislation. In the case of Indiana, there was a yet more formal and authoritative exposition of the principle for which Mr. L. contended. In the case of Indiana, the practice of a declaration of admission first occurred, which had been since followed in other cases. Properly viewed, that declaration, Mr. L. said, was only a form of notification to the other States—a proclamation by Congress to the Union, of the admission of another State into the family. That such was the light in which it was viewed on this first occasion on which it was employed, was evident from the fact, that the resolution of declaration passed on the 11th December, 1816, and the representative from the State was admitted to his seat on the 2d December, nine days preceding; so that it was evident the declaratory resolution was then regarded as a matter of form and notification merely. But there was still stronger proof, in the case of Indiana, of his position. In counting the votes for President and Vice President a few days after the above date, those of Indiana, given before the passage of the declaratory resolution, were received and counted. If a people may rightfully, and even without objection, elect a Governor, Legislature, and Judges—may elect and send to Congress Senators and Representative, and, finally, may vote for President and Vice President—upon what principle will it be said that a people, enjoying and exercising all these rights, are not a State; or that to constitute them a State, requires the further interposition of this House? He could not admit it, he repeated.

These observations, Mr. L. said, he had made with a view to show how little foundation there was for an opinion, which he had understood was not uncommon, that the act of the last session was merely a suggestion to the people of Missouri that they might form a constitution if it pleased them, and that, if that constitution met the approbation of the Congress of the United States at their next session, they should then be admitted into the Union.

Another circumstance, Mr. L. said, showed, beyond dispute, that it was not intended by this House, in passing the act of the last session, merely to give authority to the people of Missouri to propose a constitution, but that it was intended to confer on Missouri, by that act, all the rights which the oldest and proudest States of the Union are supposed to possess. When that act was under consideration, it appears by the Journal of this House that a motion was made by Mr. TAYLOR to amend the bill by striking out these words, "And the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever," and inserting, in lieu thereof, those which follow: "And if the same (that is, the constitution) shall be approved by Congress, the said Territory shall be admitted into the Union as a State, upon the same footing as the original States;" the difference being that, in the bill as it stood, (the act as it now stands,) we made her a State, and in the other we were to give her authority to form a constitution, and leave our approbation to be a condition of its final admission. A very large majority, (125 to 49,) even at that time of strong excitement and nearly equal division of opinion with respect to the restriction, voted in the negative.

The substance of Mr. L.'s argument then was, he said, that, by the act authorizing the people of Missouri to form a constitution and State government, certain rights were given to them; by the former practice of the Government, he had endeavored to show that the mere circumstance of assenting to the proposition of Congress was enough to constitute the people a State, the act of declaration, now proposed to the House, being mere surplusage. Missouri had, then, a right to form a government absolutely and inalienably. If she had not now the rights of a State, let it be shown how she had lost them. It is contrary to the principles of the Constitution, contrary to the genius of our Government, that, having once given them the right of self-government, Congress can now take it from them.

Considering this question as settled, the next important question was, whether the constitution formed by the State of Missouri becomes void by the admission into it of a clause not compatible with the Constitution of the United States, admitting, for the sake of argument, that such is the fact.

Whether that particular clause of the Constitution to which exception was understood to be taken was Constitutional or not, the interest of the nation, justice to Missouri, and respect for itself, required that the House should not undertake to decide. In taking this ground, Mr. L. said he knew he should be considered by some as evading the performance of a duty which, in the present case, they supposed to be devolved on this House. On this account he should attempt to show that no duty devolved on this House to express an opinion with respect to that clause; and intimated that he could show, were it necessary, that similar provisions were contained in various acts of the United States to which exception had been taken in neither House. The clause of the Missouri constitution to which he referred was that requiring the Legislature to pass laws to prohibit the settlement of free negroes in the State, which was supposed to conflict with the provision of the Constitution of the United States which provides that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Mr. L. here went into an argument of some detail, the amount of which was, that, as to numbers, a very large majority of the free blacks in the United States were not considered citizens in their respective States; and that, in construing any general provision of a constitution, it was fair to consider it as having a general application, and not as being without exceptions. In any view there could be nothing more clear than that, if the objected provision was capable of a construction which would reconcile it with the Constitution, it ought to receive that construction. For example, in this case of Missouri, he thought it might be quite fair to say that that provision respecting free people of color must be construed liberally, as intending to exempt from its operation such of them as were citizens in other States. However this might be, he contended, as the committee had laid it down in their report, that it was a question not for this House, but for a different tribunal to determine.

But Mr. L. said there were many who object to this course—the course pursued in all other cases—who allow that the judiciary could, with more ease, certainty, uniformity, and effect, expound Constitutional law, but contend that we must decide whether the provision in question be Constitutional or not. We must express an opinion on it, however inexpedient, because it is our duty. Now, Mr. L. said he did not see that having declared that the people of Missouri should form a constitution and State government, imposed on this House the duty of construing law in this more than any other case. It might be considered rather an objection to it, inasmuch as, in doing so, they would have to expound the law themselves had made—no principle being better established than that the authority which forms the law should not construe nor apply it. The true question in this case then was, which was the best tribunal to decide the question respecting this disputed clause of the Missouri constitution. If it were asked whether this House, or the Senate, or the Judiciary of the country, were the best qualified to expound a law, there would be no difference of opinion on the question. It must, then, be a consideration of paramount duty only on the part of this House to decide upon it, which could induce it to undertake the exposition of a law in respect to the construction of which there was a doubt.

Mr. L. then examined, somewhat at large, the question, whether a judicial or legislative tribunal be the most capable to decide correctly such a question as was supposed to be presented by the particular clause in the Constitution of Missouri. He argued, from the inability of either branch of Congress to act independently on any such question, from their inability to act with uniformity, &c., that they were not the proper bodies to be charged with judicial investigations. And why, he asked, the rights of all the States being equal, should those of Missouri be subject to an adjudication different from that to which other States are subject? The rights of the old States were subject to judicial decision; and no man would pretend that, in respect to any old State, Delaware for example, her Constitution could be suspended, that her Senators and Representatives should be excluded from these Halls, on Congress thinking they had discovered something not altogether right in her constitution. It was an essential objection to the power now claimed for Congress, that, if allowed, it would be a power to be exercised in a new State, which none would pretend it could exercise in an old one. Upon every consideration, of which he urged several others, he was in favor of leaving the matter with the Judiciary, where, and where only, in his opinion, it properly belonged.

The principles which had influenced, from time to time, the conduct of the different branches of the Government, would lead to the same conclusion. At the time of the formation of the Federal Constitution, (to go back to that date,) it was foreseen that there might be a disposition, at some future day, in some or other of the States, to break over the barriers of the Constitution about to be formed, &c., and a provision was introduced prescribing a mode of deciding controversies of that description. If, in all other cases of Constitutional questions, it has been provided that they shall be decided by the Judiciary, the reason must apply and be conclusive why this body should not undertake to decide a Constitutional question in the case of Missouri. Justice requires that those who have the same rights shall have their rights decided by the same tribunal.

If, however, the only objection to the passage of the resolution now under consideration was, that an inference might be drawn, from the silence of Congress, that they approved the exceptionable provision in the constitution of Missouri, Mr. L. suggested that some mode might be adopted by which the objection on this point might be explained. He should himself, as an individual, with the utmost reluctance express any opinion on the subject, and he thought it would be exceedingly unwise in Congress to do so. There would be no end to such a course. There were in the constitution of Missouri, and of every State in the Union, clauses to which some might take exception, of which Mr. L. instanced the provisions respecting banks, &c., which some believed the States had no right to establish. Every consideration of prudence and propriety, in his opinion, forbade from interposing in the present instance.

Mr. L. said he did admit, however, that there might be cases in which Congress might find it to be their duty to interpose, on the moment of admission of new States into the Union. For instance, if, in relation to the term of Senators, or any other provision which, from its character, could not be brought before the Supreme Court, the new constitution were incompatible with that of the United States, it was his opinion it would be a good reason why Congress should interfere. Nor did he think this was at all inconsistent with the ground he had already taken, if for no other reason than that the judicial tribunal could decide the question now agitated, and decide it better than this House. The duty of Congress, in this respect, begins where that of the Judiciary ends.

Referring to his former remark, that gentlemen would do well to satisfy themselves that their opinions were not the effect of prejudice, by examining what was the conduct of their predecessors in more quiet times, Mr. L. said he would turn to the case of the second new State which was admitted into the Union, and the objections to whose admission were removed in the way proposed in the present case. Tennessee, without waiting for a law of Congress to authorize her, held a convention, formed a constitution, and sent it on to Congress. The objection was made in the House of Representatives, by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, that the constitution of Tennessee was incompatible with that of the United States; to which Mr. BALDWIN replied, that, if there should be things in the constitution of Tennessee not compatible with the Constitution of the United States, "it was well known that the Constitution of the United States would be paramount—they can therefore be of no effect." He quoted this to show, that this suggestion of referring the question to another tribunal than this, was not an expedient to get over this case, but one which had prevailed in the early days of the Republic. The conflict between the constitution of Tennessee, however, and that of the United States, was much more unequivocal than in the present case, and so far the present case is more favorably presented to Congress than was that of Tennessee. In the latter case, the Legislature were required to provide some means by which the State of Tennessee should be sued in its courts, with a proviso that this advantage should be confined to citizens of that State, and not extended to those of other States. Here was a direct conflict with the Constitution of the United States, whilst that of Missouri is only constructive. Yet, in that case, the question of Constitutional law was left to those who were most likely to decide correctly, and withal competent to enforce their decision—that is, to the Supreme Judicial Tribunal. He thought it perfectly compatible with the most nice and rigid sense of duty for Congress to do the same in the case now before them.

Mr. L. said he knew an objection had been taken to leaving the Judiciary to sustain a conflict with a State, in regard to the conformity of its Constitution to that of the United States. But, surely, if in regard to all other States, it now has that authority, there can be no hardship in leaving the same power with it, in regard to the new States.

Mr. L. said the views he had expressed were founded on the belief that Missouri was now, to all intents and purposes, a State. But, he said, if he did not believe, that, under the act of last session, Missouri is a State already; if he thought she was only a State in fact and not a State in right, he should have the same opinion as he had now expressed. She has her own government, legislature, and judiciary, and exercises all the rights of a sovereign State. In this case, as in the other, he should think it expedient to pronounce on the Constitutional question; because, should that clause be excepted from the recognition, it could be reinstated on her becoming a State, without the power of Congress to prevent it; and the question must at last be decided by the Judiciary, the only competent tribunal.

Mr. L. here concluded his remarks, reserving for a future occasion the answers to objections which he might not have anticipated. And, on motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, December 7.

Two other members appeared and took their seats, to wit; from Pennsylvania, ANDREW BODEN; and from Kentucky, BENJAMIN HARDIN.

Mr. PINCKNEY presented a memorial and petition of the inhabitants of the city of Charleston, in South Carolina, in opposition to any increase of the tariff of duties on imports, by way of protection to the manufacturing interest of the country.

Mr. TUCKER, of South Carolina, presented a similar memorial from the inhabitants of the district of Newbury, in that State; which memorials were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. SIBLEY submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing David Cooper eighty dollars, the estimated value of a chimney and the plank of a house, taken for the use of the United States, under an order of Captain Holder, of the seventeenth regiment of infantry, in the month of December, 1814, and applied in the erection of barracks in Fort Shelby.

The resolution was read, and the question was put to agree thereto, and determined in the negative.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the district court in the district of Mississippi," was read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, Mr. NELSON of Virginia in the chair, on the resolution declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the other States of the Union. And the question having been again stated—

Mr. SERGEANT rose. Of the speech which he delivered, occupying upwards of two hours' time, the following must be considered as a free but not a very full report.

Mr. S. began by saying that this subject had been so long and so much talked of, and written of, it was so much connected with considerations arising out of the question so much debated at the last session, that he hardly doubted every member of this Committee had for himself made up his mind on the immediate question. It was not, therefore, with any great hope of persuading others, that he now rose, but from a wish to explain the grounds of his own opinion, which was entertained with so much sincerity that he could not permit himself to doubt that the opinion of every member of the Committee was entertained with equal sincerity, and that the question would be decided, as it ought to be, on its real merits. With respect to the question hinted at by the gentleman from South Carolina, and discussed at the last session, Mr. S. said he did not agree with him that the decision of the question now before the House depended upon the decision of the question agitated at the last session. How far that question might be involved in the present question, might be a subject for consideration; but, independently of that question, the one now presented was a very important one. However minute in itself, if it extended but to a single provision of the constitution presented by the people of Missouri, it yet involved considerations which those, who had listened to the arguments of the gentleman from South Carolina, must see, went to the whole extent of determining what power actually remained in Congress with regard to any Territory after authorizing them to form a constitution—what they have a right to insist upon, what they have a right to do and say upon the subject—in short, the question whether Congress have or have not any power at all under the Constitution of the United States, with respect to the admission of a new State into the Union, after the passage of an act authorizing the people to form a constitution.

It could not be doubted or denied, Mr. S. admitted, that there was, in looking at the admissions of States into the Union, heretofore, at least, an apparent irregularity, and much of apparent disorder. If, however, any inference were to be drawn from precedents in the case, it would be, that there never had been any precise examination of the powers of Congress in this respect—no established mode of admission—or, in other words, that there had been every variety of mode. For the sake of the future peace and harmony of the Government of the United States; for the sake of the territories hereafter applying to be admitted into the Union—for the sake of Congress alone, said Mr. S., it is incumbent on us all to examine the grounds of this question; to see what are our rights, and what theirs, and deduce, from a full consideration of these, a rule which shall be uniform as to the States hereafter to be admitted into the Union, and free from the danger of exposing us to contests such as that which appears to have arisen on the present occasion.

The power to admit a State into the Union, no one would doubt, was a very high one—a power to part with a portion of that authority which was originally vested in the old States, and which exists in the present States, and to admit to a participation in our counsels, in our power, in the control and management of every thing concerning our rights and property, a new and integral member of the Union. The question became one of graver consideration, when it was considered that it was proposed now to extend this participation to an object which was not in the contemplation of those who formed the Constitution of the United States, who had looked, in their provisions to the territory then in possession of the United States, and probably had never calculated on the admission of States out of territory beyond the original limits of the United States. This high power was given to Congress; and, after the discussion of last session, it was needless to say, was given without limitation. The power is "to admit new States into the Union;" it is granted in the broadest and most comprehensive manner—and, it would seem to follow, as the consequence of this grant of general authority, that Congress possessed every power and authority necessary to its fair exercise. Whatever power was really given to Congress, it was their duty to exercise, and not turn it over to any other Department, confiding in it to cure the defect which Congress suffered to pass uncorrected. There was nothing in the Constitution of the United States which countenanced a different course. It is our right and our duty, said Mr. S., when a State offers herself for admission into the Union, to see that she can come into the Union under the Constitution of the United States, and in conformity with its provisions. For certainly, whatever were the terms in which the power was given to the people of Missouri to form a constitution, no one could for a single moment doubt that that power was never intended to transcend the Constitution of the United States, or to bring into the Union a State whose Constitution was not conformable to that of the United States. Such a grant would have been an exercise of authority by Congress beyond the Constitution: it would be an anomaly impossible to account for—an inconsistency with the Constitution of the United States which it would be impossible for any one to reconcile.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

It would therefore seem, that when, as incident to the power of admitting States into the Union, Congress authorized a Territory to form a constitution and State government, it must follow that the constitution, so to be formed, is to be conformable to the Constitution of the United States, and that the Territory thus authorized does not in any sense become a State until she has formed such a constitution. Our power, said Mr. S., is to admit, and incidentally to authorize the formation of a constitution, with a view to admission. Have Congress the power to authorize a people to form a constitution and State government sovereign and independent of the United States? No, the power to authorize a people to form a constitution is an implied power, subordinate to the full power, which never is effectually exercised until the act of admission subsequent to the formation of a constitution.

Mr. S. said, he made these remarks in the outset, to meet at once an argument of the member from South Carolina, which was plausible, captivating, and seemed to be calculated to smooth the way, and remove every difficulty. That argument was that the State, from the moment of its formation of a constitution, became an independent and sovereign State. Where, said Mr. S., is your power in the Constitution to make such a State? Your power is to admit States into the Union, and your power to authorize the people of a Territory to form a constitution is merely subordinate and subsidiary to the main power. Can you admit a State by anticipation, as the gentleman has suggested? You transcend your authority if you do so. Mr. S. ventured to say that Congress never had done so; that they could not do so; and, in some sense or other, every member of the Committee would agree with him in this opinion. Could Congress, by anticipation, bind itself to the admission of a State, (for such was the argument yesterday pressed upon the Committee,) so as to have no choice but to accept such a constitution as that State chose to offer? Surely not; but, according to the argument advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina, not only was the present Congress to be bound by the act of the last session, but the present Congress might, by an act passed now, bind the next Congress to the admission of a State into the Union. Was the authority given by Congress to the people to form a constitution, a compact with them that they should be admitted into the Union on any other terms than those prescribed to them? For one, Mr. S. said, he did not feel himself bound, by giving the authority to a people to form a constitution, to admit them into the Union, unless their constitution should be such as the people of the United States, through their representatives, thought fit to accept as the fundamental rule of government of the State thus to be admitted.

Mr. S. then proceeded to say, that he did not mean now to enter into the question of the last session—it had been discussed enough. He did not mean to abandon the opinion which he had then formed and expressed. It had not been formed hastily, but carefully and deliberately, and he had seen no reason to change his mind upon it. Without going into that question at all, he should proceed to the immediate question presented by the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina.

This single question was, whether it is the right and duty of Congress, before admitting a State into the Union, to see that its constitution and State government be not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. He should have hoped, he said, and he yet hoped, that the opinion would be nearly unanimous in this body, that there might be such a repugnancy between such a State constitution and the Constitution of the United States, as would not only justify Congress in interfering, but make it their imperious duty to interfere, to prevent her taking rank in the Union. Whether that was the case in the present instance, was, he said, a different question.

The preliminary inquiry was that which he had just stated. It had been said that Missouri was already an independent State; that she has formed a State government under an unlimited authority from Congress; and that she has now the same rights as the proudest and oldest States in the Union. If it be so, said Mr. S., what are we now deliberating about? Why is it, that the resolution now under consideration is proposed for our adoption? Why are this and the other House called upon to pass a legislative act which is altogether unnecessary, and which has clauses in it, if this construction be true, which are extremely objectionable? If this construction be correct, her Senators and Representative have a right to their seats on the floor of either House—to unite in the common counsels on the affairs of the Union, and to give to the votes of Missouri the same force as those of any other State. Why are they, then, said Mr. S., kept waiting at our doors, and not permitted to partake of our deliberations? Why do they wait until the fate of this resolution be known?

It was said that this resolution was nothing but a declaration of a fact. Such a notification was not necessary for the Senators and Representative of Missouri; it was not necessary for Congress, if, the fact being known, the former had nothing to do to entitle them to a seat, but to advance to the Chair of either House and take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Why was it, moreover, that the constitution of Missouri had been submitted to a committee of this House? Why had a report been made by that committee, and why was this House now discussing it? And why was it that that report went into an examination of a particular clause of that constitution, and pointed out the mode in which Congress were to relieve themselves from the task of deciding on its constitutionality, by leaving it to the Judiciary? If the gentleman's doctrine were true, this is all superfluous. It is more, said Mr. S., for the resolution declares that Missouri shall be, and hereafter is declared to be, one of the United States, &c. He did not use this reference, he said, for the mere effect of verbal criticism, but for a higher purpose. When a committee, composed as that committee was, finds itself under the necessity of presenting a resolution, to be adopted by a joint vote of both Houses, declared that Missouri is thereby, not that she has been admitted into the Union, was it not as strong evidence as could be furnished, that there was something which seemed to compel those who acted on it to say, that this declaration of the fact is the virtual legislation which brings Missouri into the Union—which qualifies her for induction to the Union, and that anterior to it she was not a State, and not entitled to be? From what period, Mr. S. asked, was it that Missouri was admitted into the Union? It would be from the moment of the adoption of this resolution. Could it be said of any antecedent period? Here, Mr. S. said, he would avail himself of another concession of the gentleman from South Carolina; and, in taking to his aid a concession of his, Mr. S. said he did it with the full impression that it was the result of the conviction of his own mind, and with the benefit, therefore, of the conviction of such a mind as his. That gentleman had admitted that Congress might, if they thought proper, introduce a qualification of their assent to the admission of Missouri into the Union, which shall serve to show its dissent to a particular clause of the constitution of that State. If this resolution, then, instead of being merely formal and declaratory, was susceptible of an amendment by which Congress could exclude that interpretation of a particular clause of the State constitution which on its face it bears, would it be said that the State was a member of the Union without the adoption of that resolve? If so, where did Congress derive the authority to legislate on the interpretation of its constitution? Mr. S. further called the attention of the Committee to the terms of the preamble of this resolution, wherein it is declared that, "whereas, in pursuance of an act of Congress, &c., the people of the said Territory did, on the 19th day of July, 1820, by a convention called for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which constitution and State government, so formed, is republican, and in conformity to the provisions of the said act." The reason assigned for her admission is, that she has formed a constitution in conformity to the provisions of the act of last session. How could the committee know this? By their own examination? Could Congress, then, declare this to be the case, without having examined the constitution of the new State? Certainly not. And when, in the act authorizing the formation of this constitution were found two limitations, that it should be republican, and that it should not be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, did it not become indispensable, before passing a preamble and resolution like this, that the members of this House should be satisfied in their own minds that these requisitions have been complied with?

If, in a single article, the constitution of Missouri be repugnant to that of the United States, said Mr. S., can we seriously assert that she has formed a constitution according to the authority given to her? And, when called on to say how we can reconcile it to ourselves to sanction such a contradiction in terms, will it be sufficient to say that we have nothing to do with that question, and will leave it to the Judiciary to decide? We have nothing to do with it! exclaimed Mr. SERGEANT. Why, then, prescribe to the people of Missouri any conditions in the first instance? Why not say, we gave her a right to form a constitution; she has formed it, and, whether it be or be not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, she is a member of the Union? The contradiction was sufficiently apparent in the fact of the introduction of this resolution: it would be seen at once, that the House was neither conforming to the Constitution of the United States, to the act of the last session, nor to any principle heretofore observed in the admission of States. Could it be said that Congress had parted with the power of looking into the constitution of Missouri, when it had expressly prescribed conditions which should be indispensable to its acceptance? The terms of the compact, if the act of the last session was to be considered a compact, between the United States and Missouri, were perfectly clear; and he took this opportunity of saying, that, if Missouri was involved in difficulty—if Congress found itself in perplexity—if the Union was disturbed on this occasion—if this House was impelled to the consideration of questions which it was painful to act upon, it was not the fault of Congress—it was not the fault of the Constitution of the United States, but it was the fault of the people of Missouri. It might be their error—an error which they would be glad to avail themselves of an opportunity to correct—for, Mr. S. said, he could not believe the people of Missouri would have wantonly introduced into their constitution a clause at variance with the Constitution of the United States, under an impression that this act of admission was a mere form. They would not wantonly have done it, for it could not be either their interest or their inclination to try the temper of the Congress of the United States—to try how far its regard to the Constitution would bear it out in the contest, or how far it would consent to surrender a portion of the rights of the whole Union to avoid a difficulty which the people of Missouri have themselves created. There was prescribed to them but one condition; to that condition they had not conformed, and they are not entitled to admission into the Union. The failure to fulfil the compact is on the part of the people of Missouri; and, said Mr. S., when we come, in a case of this sort, to the question between remanding this constitution for reconsideration, or giving up the smallest possible portion of Constitutional power, I trust that the people of every part of the Union would bear us out in saying that the Constitution shall be inviolate; and that we shall not be the first to set a precedent which, begun to-day, may be followed to-morrow, until it involves the very existence of our Government.

Would the people of Missouri, Mr. S. asked, think more highly of Congress were it to yield to them on this occasion? Would they not hereafter come into the Union with more respect for Congress, and with more respect for themselves, too—with a higher sense of the value of admission into the Union, if Congress now fairly met this question, thus giving to the people of Missouri an assurance that what was now done with respect to them should be hereafter the rule of conduct for Congress, as to others asking admission into the Union? Would it not show to them that Congress was disposed to do all in its power to preserve the blessings of this Government for them and for their posterity? What, he asked, would be the consequence of submission by Congress in the present case? Missouri will have extorted from us something; another State will extort something more; each will appeal to our fears, which may be well or ill founded; each new State will endeavor to exact from us what she thinks will make for her own interest, until at last they will not think it worth while to ask our leave to do as they choose. How much better would it be for Congress at once to take its ground, and refuse to sanction the constitution of any State which is in any respect repugnant to that of the United States!

Suppose that this constitution of Missouri, instead of being faulty in a single particular, were throughout, from beginning to end, at variance with the Constitution of the United States.—Would it be pretended, in that case, that Missouri was entitled to be admitted into the Union? Certainly not; yet the only argument in favor of her admission, with one clause of her constitution incompatible with that of the United States, went the whole length, or necessarily involved the consequence of yielding the whole; because it was founded on the ground that Congress had parted with the whole power, and had no right to pass upon the constitution; on the ground, in short, that Missouri is now admitted into the Union.

The gentleman himself, however, had, in another part of his speech, given up this, which was the essential part of his argument; for he had conceded that, if the constitution of Missouri was repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, in particulars which could not be submitted to the judicial authority for decision, Congress ought to interfere. If, said Mr. S., we ought in any case to interfere, there must be a mode of interference. What is the mode, and what should be the time? When, certainly, she presents herself for admission. And, if we have then a right to inquire whether there is or is not occasion for our interference, is not the whole ground of the gentleman's argument abandoned?

Pursuing his argument, Mr. S. said he held it to be perfectly true that there could be no violation of the Constitution of the United States which would not produce injurious civil and political effects, as distinguished from individual effects over which the Judiciary have control. How many men may be injured before one man appears with a spirit to resist the injustice! What, Mr. S. asked, did the history of all Governments exhibit to us but a series of usurpations on one hand and sufferings on the other, submitted to until they became too grievous longer to be borne? Men suffer long; they suffer from necessity, from poverty, from ignorance, from the want of capacity to exert those rights which belong to them, and which it ought to be the care of a wise Government to preserve to them. Why is it that the names of men who, in all time past, have resisted oppression, have been immortalized by the historian, the painter, and the poet? Why have they been considered as entitled to peculiar honors? Because they took upon themselves the burden, and a heavy burden it is, of resisting by force the Government which had long oppressed and persecuted them and their fellow men, under the forms of law. Now, said Mr. S., if we allow bad principles to be admitted into the constitutions of States formed under our eye, or good principles to be excluded, what will be the consequence? You shift the responsibility from yourselves and leave it to individuals to fight the battle with the States. Why do our State constitutions contain declarations of rights? Why have the people been so careful thus to lay down the principles which are to guide the Government in its operations? For the purpose of preserving political and civil rights inviolate as well as individual rights, and to prevent individuals from suffering under their violation.

Coming nearer to the particular question involved in the constitution now presented by Missouri, Mr. S. said, suppose that constitution had said that no free white citizen of the United States should come to reside in Missouri—was there any gentleman who would say that, with such a provision in her constitution, Missouri ought to be admitted into the Union? He would not answer for others, but, for himself, he believed such a provision would produce such a shock as would occasion but one feeling throughout the country—that of resistance. This was an extreme case, he knew, (not likely to happen,) but he had put it for the purpose of illustration; and he confessed that the argument appeared to him irresistible, that a power to examine the provisions of the constitution must exist, and that a power to refuse admission, in certain cases, must necessarily result.

If Congress, having the power to reject, should yet accept the constitution of Missouri, Mr. S. contended it could not, with any propriety, be said that Congress did not approve the constitution of Missouri.

The trust of guarding the Constitution of the United States from violation, said he, in continuation, is peculiarly and emphatically ours. We are sworn to support the Constitution before we enter on the duties to which we are called under it; and, he believed the gentleman from South Carolina himself, and every other member of this House, would go along with him in saying that their support of the Constitution ought to be active and zealous, and not a cold and penurious support. It ought to be no calculation how much they might give up of that Constitution, but a determination that even if there be doubt, that doubt should be determined in favor of the Constitution. It should be thus, said he, that by a constant, warm, and cordial support of it here, we may invigorate and quicken the respect and veneration for that instrument, which, I trust, is entertained by the whole people of the United States.

With respect to the proposition to turn over to the judiciary the decision of the question involved in this constitution, Mr. S. said, he must declare, that, with the greatest respect possible for the judiciary; with the highest confidence in their rectitude and wisdom; with the greatest willingness to submit to their decisions in their proper sphere; he could not consent, on a question which was properly presented for his own decision, to say, let the question sleep till some humble individual, some poor citizen, shall come forward and claim a decision of it. He never would pass a duty by, by leaving it to some individual to do what Congress ought to have done. No, Mr. S. said, his idea of supporting the Constitution was, to give it such an active support as should convince everybody that even the appearance of violation of it would not be permitted. And he begged gentlemen, before they consented to take a course different from this, that they would consider, seriously consider, what may be the effect, in a Government depending on public opinion for its support, of a disrespect of its authority exhibited on this floor.

Mr. S. then noticed the argument which Mr. LOWNDES had derived from the Journal of this House of the last session, in the case of the motion of Mr. TAYLOR to amend the Missouri act so as to require her constitution, when formed, to be approved by Congress, &c., before she could become a State—which motion was negatived by two to one. Mr. S. admitted the fact, but argued that it proved nothing in favor of Mr. LOWNDES's argument. Gentlemen had voted against it on various grounds; some, he knew, had voted against it because they believed it superfluous, holding the opinion which he was now maintaining, that the constitution must, of course, receive the sanction of Congress before it could be of any authority, &c.

Mr. S. then referred, for illustration to the case of Louisiana, who was required to submit her constitution to Congress, and it was submitted and approved accordingly before it went into operation. If Congress, according to the gentleman's argument, had no right to do so, this proceeding was all unconstitutional and void. And it was worthy of remark that, at the same time that constitution was required to be submitted to Congress, it was also required to be not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Yet Louisiana was not intended to be admitted on different terms from other States, but on the same, &c.

But, independently of the act of the last session, it had been asserted that Missouri is now a State; that she is a State in fact. Mr. S. asked of gentlemen seriously to consider this position. From what time has she become a State? From the moment of the passage of our act, from that of the adoption of her constitution, or from that of the organization of her government? He did not distinctly understand from what point of time the gentleman from South Carolina dated her independence—

[Mr. LOWNDES here explained what point of time he referred to. It was at the moment when, the question having been formally proposed to the people of Missouri, whether they chose to form a constitution and State government, they voted it expedient to do so, it was then that he thought arose the right in them of self-government.]

Mr. S. did not consider the point of time in this respect material. The question was, is Missouri entitled to the rights of a State until she be admitted into the Union by Congress? In support of this opinion, he said, no reason had been assigned that was founded in the Constitution of the United States. Reasons had been assigned by the gentleman of South Carolina, which appeared to him to be founded in a convenience which amounted to a sort of necessity, but no argument had been drawn from the Constitution in support of this position. We have the power to admit a State into the Union, said Mr. S., but was it ever supposed that a State was admitted, by her own act, before we admitted her? Could it be pretended that, when Congress authorized the people of Missouri to form a constitution, and under the circumstances of this case, they did admit them into the Union? It might be argued, with some plausibility, that Congress had by that act engaged that, at some time, they should be admitted into the Union. If the authority given had been to erect themselves into a sovereign and independent State, Mr. S. would have been able to understand the argument that they are now a State. But, when Congress gave them authority to form a constitution to fit them for admission, to say that Congress did then admit them into the Union was an argument not intelligible; and almost equally so was that which made her out to be a State whenever her people had formed a constitution.

The United States, with respect to her territory, stood almost in the same relation as one of the States to its territory. Virginia, for example, gave authority to the people of that part of her territory which is now Kentucky, to form a constitution. The territory called a convention, made a State government, fixed the mode of her elections, and elected her officers. Was she then a member of the Union? Yes, when Congress agreed to admit her into the Union. Was she a State before that took place? Certainly not. So with the Territories of the United States. Congress gives them authority to make a constitution, preparatory to their admission, and that being done, Congress may admit them.

If, said Mr. S. further, Representatives from a Territory which has thus formed a constitution, present themselves at the door of this House, is not the House bound to inquire whether they are the Representatives of a State? Must we not examine whether they are properly deputed, or must we admit anybody and everybody who presents himself and declares that he is the Representative of a State? We may know the fact out of doors, but it must also be known here; to ascertain it, we are obliged to examine the Constitution. Mr. S. entered into a train of reasoning to show the inconvenience which would result from each branch of the Government being left to determine for itself the independence of a State, the chance of their not concurring in their views of the subject, and the incongruity which would result from such a disagreement.

The orderly, politic, and regular course of proceeding in such a case as this, was so obvious, he said, that he was only astonished that, in any case, a different course had been pursued. In the main, he said, the construction had been that for which he contended. Whatever irregularities there might have been in other respects, with respect to the newly formed States, the full extension to a State of the benefits of its admission into the Union had never taken place until, by some act, Congress had expressly or impliedly recognised its admission.

Mr. S. then proceeded to inquire whether the practice of our Government sustained the doctrine which he had endeavored to show was inconsistent with its theory. With respect to precedents, whilst he disavowed a slavish subjection to their authority, yet he acknowledged that if they were clear and undeviating, showing an uniform practice under the Constitution to the present time, he should consider them of very high authority. He recollected, in a case at the last session, the gentleman from South Carolina had not considered them of so great weight; but Mr. S. said he agreed with that gentleman now in allowing them weight, provided they have the character of uniformity. He was mistaken if, upon examination, they did not turn out differently from what the member from South Carolina had supposed. In examining them, a precedent might be made out to warrant any course gentlemen chose, they differed so much from each other; among them might be found one for a people making a constitution without previous authority from Congress, and that too out of the territory of the United States, for which nobody would contend. Mr. S. here briefly ran over the cases of admission into the Union commenting on each. Kentucky, Vermont, Tennessee, Ohio, and Louisiana, were admitted up to 1811, inclusive, and in every case some act of the Government had been thought necessary, precedent or subsequent, to entitle them to admission. From the year 1811, however, every State admitted (five in number, besides Maine, whose case was peculiar) had been formed by previous authority, and had come into the Union by virtue of an act or resolution expressly admitting her. Would gentlemen, then, take the single precedent of Kentucky, of Tennessee, of Vermont, with their peculiarities, and apply it to a State formed out of a new Territory purchased by the United States, or would they take the case of other States, which formed a series of precedents, each distinctly recognising the power of Congress to give previous authority to a people to form a constitution, and also the authority and right of Congress to admit them into the Union, and the necessity of such an act of admission?

With respect to elections by the inchoate States, he considered them as provisional, and made valid by the ratification of the Constitution. The Representative from Indiana taking his seat before the passage of the act for her admission, he considered an oversight. And was not the fact of the Representative from Missouri remaining absent, asserting no right as a Representative, and not being admitted as such, (and so of her Senators also,) a stronger evidence of the opinion, not only of the old States, but of the new States too, than a single precedent of irregularity, as that of Indiana?

Having shown, in his opinion, that Congress possessed the right and power to examine this question, Mr. S. proceeded to the remaining points in the discussion.

In this particular case, the mode of proceeding proposed, struck him as the most objectionable that could be devised; because it seemed to him that the report and the observations of the chairman of the committee, did admit that there was something in the Constitution formed by the people of Missouri, upon which, if the House was called upon to speak, gentlemen would be obliged to say they are of opinion it is unconstitutional; for, in the first place, the committee are willing to leave the decision on a particular clause to the Judiciary; in the next place, they think it susceptible of an interpretation not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States; and, it is lastly suggested, that Congress may avoid the difficulty by a protest, or explanation, or interpretation of the clause, as they desire it to be understood. All this seemed to convey the impression that there was something there, which gentlemen wished to avoid voting and deciding upon.

To refer the subject to the Judiciary was one mode proposed for getting over it. To this course there were a great many objections, which doubtless had already occurred to the minds of the Committee. Among these, Mr. S. dwelt particularly on the following: that, if it be the duty of this House to pronounce on any question they had no right to shift the responsibility on the Judiciary; and that Congress cannot send the question to the

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Judiciary, there being no mode prescribed in the Constitution by which they could do it.

With regard to leaving it to chance to bring it before the Judiciary, that chance might never come, &c. If the Judiciary were, indeed, the tribunal to decide the question, they ought to decide it before the House acted on it. Another great objection to the course proposed was, that it would unnecessarily throw on the Judiciary the performance of an odious duty, which he acknowledged this to be; and it seemed to him gentlemen showed too strongly, by their mode of proceeding, and their endeavors to throw it from themselves, that they felt it to be so. But this House was much better able to bear the odium of it than the Judiciary. Mr. S. said, he never would consent that the Congress of the United States should, for their own relief, burden the Judiciary with that sort of question, the decision of which makes it most obnoxious, exposes it most to that excitement which, of all departments of the Government, it was least capable of contending against. The effects of unpopular decisions in the State courts, showed what might possibly be the effect, in similar cases, on the United States Judiciary. He wished the whole strength of the Federal Judiciary might be maintained unimpaired for cases wherein the exertion of it might be necessary, which it was not in the present case. Another objection to the course proposed was, that, if the argument in its favor proved any thing, it proved too much. The more objectionable a clause of the Constitution is, the stronger is the reason against the reference of it to the Judiciary, because it would there more certainly be declared so. A full consideration of all the views which could be taken of the subject, Mr. S. said, would bring him back to the true ground, that this House ought to decide itself upon the question.

If the Judiciary had been the proper tribunal to determine this question, Mr. S. went on to argue, it was so as to all questions which could arise respecting a new constitution; and if a gross and palpable series of infractions of the Constitution of the United States were contained in a constitution formed by the people of a Territory, Congress would be justified, as much as in the present case, in referring it to the Judiciary.

It had been suggested that the present was a case which it would be difficult for Congress to decide, because the clause of the Missouri constitution was said to have offended that clause of the Constitution of the United States to which it was most difficult to give a precise interpretation. That clause, Mr. S. quoted in the following words: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Mr. S. said he should be exceedingly sorry to believe that this clause was so difficult of construction that this House could not decide whether or not it had been violated in a given case; because, in one of our standard books, (the Federalist,) one of those authorities to which we refer for light in difficult cases of construction of the Constitution, it was said, that this very clause was the "basis of the Union." Strange, indeed, that this clause should have been considered the basis of the Union, and yet so equivocal that a construction could not be given to it.

If there was a difficulty in defining precisely the scope of the clause of the Constitution, there could be none in deciding that it does give to the citizens of each State in the Union, the humblest and lowest right enjoyed by a free man. Did any one doubt, Mr. S. asked, that this clause give to citizens of every State the free right to go into any other State, to return, or to remain there? If that was denied, then he would agree that this clause of the Constitution was all words and no meaning. Here, then, was the very point of this question. If the constitution of the State of Missouri has, either by its own positive provisions, or by enjoining it on its Legislature, excluded altogether from the State of Missouri any man who is a citizen of another State in this Union, then it is impossible to reconcile that constitution to the Constitution of the United States. It would be a defiance, which is worse than resistance, to the Constitution of the United States, if it had been intentional; but Mr. S. acquitted Missouri of any such intention.

Mr. S. declined going into the question how far a State had a right to make laws with regard to a certain class of persons referred to in the objected clause of the Missouri constitution. He briefly examined the suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES that that clause did not intend to exclude such persons as were citizens in other States. But the clause itself, Mr. S. said, made no distinction of classes, but extended equally to both classes. Missouri might make the distinction if she chose. Was it for Congress to make an exception for her which she did not choose to make for herself, and which the Legislature of Missouri might not choose to consider as any part of that clause of the Constitution? Congress had no right to interpret for them their own meaning. He then went on to show in what States free persons of color were citizens, and mentioned North Carolina, New York, and Massachusetts, among them. To make them citizens of any State it was not necessary they should have a right to vote, as Mr. S. showed by various references, that more than half the white men in some of our States did not vote, because they were not freeholders; yet no one would deny them to be citizens of those States, &c.

It was the humble simple privilege of locomotion only that was now claimed for these persons: it was a right indispensable to citizenship, and it was all that was asked for in the present case. If there was any way in which a citizen of one State can enjoy all the privileges and immunities of a citizen of another State, and yet not be permitted to set his foot in it, Mr. S. said he should be glad to be informed of it. With respect to the right of Missouri or of any State of the Union to regulate its own citizens, or to prescribe laws for their government, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, Mr. S. said, no one pretended to interfere. She must regulate her own concerns, upon such policy as she thinks best, &c. On what would be her true policy, Mr. S. made a few remarks which the reporter did not hear with sufficient distinctness to report them.

Upon the whole, Mr. S. said, it was clear that, unless something was introduced, by interpretation, into the clause of the constitution of Missouri, respecting free people of color, which the framers of it have not introduced, and which it is not known that they would be willing to introduce, it is a plain and palpable infraction of the Constitution of the United States.

The plain course, then, he believed, was not to receive the constitution formed by the people of Missouri. For himself, he believed, and with him many of the members of this House believed, that it was the duty of this House to look into the Constitution, and if they found it contrary to the Constitution, that it was the duty of this House to reject it.

What the consequences of doing so might be, it was not for him to anticipate; but, whatever they might be, they could not be worse than the recognition of the constitution in its present shape. But why apprehend any disagreeable consequences? Might not Congress discuss a question of this sort without reference to danger? Might it not reject this constitution of Missouri, without giving her any right to unqualified independence? Or was this House to give way, right or wrong? True, Mr. S. said, Congress had been much divided in opinion on the question of the last session, and they might be on this. But, as far as gentlemen might think the consequences of such division dangerous—the consequences they dreaded were the consequences of free and fair investigation—the consequence of men doing what they believe to be right; and when men yield to fears excited by such causes, they give up the right of free discussion, the right of exercising their own judgment, the right of maintaining what, in their consciences, they think to be right. Does it follow, because there is a strong opposition to any measure, because there is great feeling and warmth on it, that therefore principle is to be abandoned? That no one would maintain. Neither was it consistent with the theory of our Government; because, at last, the will of the majority must govern. And, whatever fears might be entertained by others, Mr. S. said, he felt confident that the will of the majority would be submitted to.

With respect to what would be the condition of the Territory on the rejection of this constitution, Mr. S. said, it appeared to him it would be territorial. What provision it might be necessary to make, in respect to it he did not pretend to say, nor whether it would be necessary to make any. A case of the sort had never occurred in the history of our Government, and it would, if it occurred, deserve a careful and deliberate examination and decision. Here Mr. S. concluded his observations.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, who desired an opportunity of stating the reasons which would induce him to vote against the resolution for the admission of Missouri, the Committee rose, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, December 8.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to amend the act of the last session for altering the times of holding the terms of the circuit court for the District of Columbia. [The object of this bill is to intermit the approaching December term, inasmuch as the term following is, under the new arrangement, to be held in April instead of July, as heretofore.] The bill was twice read and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of the State of Louisiana, enclosing a certificate of the election of JOSIAH S. JOHNSTON, as the representative of that State in the seventeenth Congress of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting sundry statements, rendered in obedience to the resolution of this House, of the 28th ultimo, respecting the amount of moneys drawn from the Treasury for the War and Navy Departments, from 30th December, 1819, to the 13th November, 1820, with the disposition thereof, and of transfers during the late recess of Congress; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. Foor moved that the House do now proceed to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 6th instant, in relation to the infliction of corporal punishment, and the prohibition of the practice of duelling in the navy of the United States; and the question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative.

MISSOURI.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution declaring the admission of Missouri into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said, that the state of his health should perhaps admonish him not to address the Committee at all, on the interesting question before them. They would, however, find in this circumstance a security that he should not occupy much of their time.

I am only anxious, said Mr. S., in the vote which I shall give against the admission of Missouri into the Union as a State, to be neither misunderstood or misrepresented. The opinion which I expressed at the last session against the power of Congress to prescribe, by anticipation, to States, conditions of the nature then proposed, to be incorporated into their constitutions, places me in a situation somewhat peculiar, and entitles me to some claim of indulgence from the Committee. That opinion then formed, after much careful deliberation and anxious inquiry, I have since found no reason to change. It is not, therefore, with any view to apologize for the course which I then pursued, that I am induced to offer my sentiments at this time on the question now before us. Apology could only spring from the consciousness of error; and I have no propitiation to offer to secure the favor of any man or set of men whatever. The consciousness of rectitude is my shield against all the obloquy which has been cast upon my name, and my support under every accusation which has been laid to my charge. The Committee will pardon these observations. It has, indeed, been truly said, by one not less distinguished for his profound political attainments than his deep knowledge of the human character, that it becomes a man to speak but seldom of himself. Were I alone concerned in the subject before you, my opinion would have been expressed by a silent vote. Short as my political experience has been, (and my public services are probably near their close,) I have learned enough to know that it is an extremely difficult task for a public man to discharge his duty to his country and escape the malice or misconception of others. However plausibly it may be maintained as a matter of general political speculation, that a Representative here is bound by the will of his constituents, it is not easy to reconcile this ingenious theory with the moral sanctions imposed by our Constitution. The responsibility of the oath to support the Constitution of my country is upon me, and however highly I respect the opinion of others, the obligation to discharge it faithfully rests not upon them. To say that I am insensible to public favor, would be to deny that I am a mere man. I am more anxious, however, to deserve than to enjoy it, and my own constituents would be first to despise me, justly, were I to seek its continuance at the expense of sacrificing the first qualification which can entitle any man to their good opinion—the firm determination to discharge the trust confided to his hands, in conformity to his own sense of public duty.

Whatever our opinions may be on the subject which was here agitated at the last session, it is now to be determined whether Missouri shall be admitted to the distinguished rank of one of the sister States of our Union. Believing that the constitution which she has presented to us is repugnant, at least in one of its provisions, to the Constitution of the United States, I am constrained to express an opinion against the adoption of the resolution now under consideration. The Legislature of the proposed State are directed, "as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, the State, under any pretext whatever." The authority thus conferred by the people of Missouri on their Legislature, in my judgment, infringes the security contained in the Constitution of the United States, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

The committee who reported this resolution have said, that "of all the articles in our Constitution, there is probably not one more difficult to construe well," than this. I had, indeed, supposed, that, on the principle established in this article, rested the whole structure of our National Government. It was upon considerations derived chiefly from the nature of our political system in this respect, that I had at the last session formed the opinion against our power to insist on the restriction proposed to be inserted in the bill then before us. An attentive examination of the characteristics which peculiarly distinguish the present Government from the old Confederacy, will best illustrate the true construction and operation of this article of the Constitution.

The old Confederation was a mere league of friendship formed among the States for their mutual defence and security. It was strictly a confederacy of State sovereignties. Its powers were delegated by, and drawn from, the States in their corporate capacities, representing the sovereignty of the people of their respective jurisdictions. It was in its nature a treaty of alliance between different nations, who had recently become independent communities, and formed or adopted for themselves constitutions of civil government. The particular objects of the alliance were special and defined in the terms of the compact. These articles of union, like other treaties between sovereign Powers, were susceptible of alteration or amendment only with the unanimous consent of the States. Every power and right reserved, was reserved to the States. The people of the respective States were not as citizens amenable to its authority except as citizens of the State governments. The authority of the Confederacy operated only on the States in their political capacity; and its powers were only carried into execution through their instrumentality. Through these, as the organs of the will of the old Congress, and the agents for giving effect to its operations, it derived all its efficacy, as from them it had derived all its authority. Indeed, it might well have been doubted, if doubt could exist, if it were at all competent to the States to have established any other system of general authority. The people of the respective States could not have been subjected to a jurisdiction deriving its powers from the delegated authority of their State Legislatures. This structure of General Government, if government it might be named, was kept together during the war only by the pressure of public calamity.

At the return of peace its evils were felt, and, for all the purposes of union and defence, it was found altogether inefficient or useless. Its power was openly contemned, its operations defeated, and as all its efficacy depended on the will of the respective State Legislatures, some of whom were prepared, or had in fact resisted its authority, if the compact was not already virtually dissolved, it was rapidly hastening to annihilation, or to a state that was little more than a mockery of self-government. Being thus in its nature a mere treaty among the States, the citizens of each member of the Confederacy were considered as citizens only of their respective State governments. All their rights and immunities beyond these jurisdictions depended upon the will of any party of the Confederacy who might choose to withdraw from the alliance or set its authority at defiance. Among the evils of this system had already appeared the very defect of the security of the rights of citizens of other States, and measures adopted by some of the States had given cause for loud and just complaints of the violation of this security. The friends of our National Union were universally alarmed. It was evident to all, that, without a radical change in the structure of the system, the fairest fruits of our independence would be blasted, and that union on which depended our strength, if not even the perpetuity of civil liberty among us, might be forever dissolved. The Convention which formed our present Constitution of civil government, impressed with this conviction, discarded the principle on which the old Confederacy was framed. They retained merely that representation of the States in the new system which was necessary to the security, and which should protect the sovereignty of the States over the powers not delegated to the National Government.

The great and cardinal principle of our Constitution created a National Government of the people of the United States. Its powers were derived from, and delegated by, the people, in their conventions, not as citizens of distinct sovereignties, but in their collective capacity, as citizens of one great Republic. The powers vested in the Government now operated directly on the people. Its legislature and judiciary are the legislature and judiciary of the nation. The public will no longer apply for aid to the Legislatures of the States, but extends its authority as the universal law of the nation to every citizen. The citizens of the respective States are no longer alien to each other as subjects of different sovereignties. In relation to the powers vested in the General Government we have become emphatically one people, under one National Government—allied to each other as citizens of one country—responsible to one supreme authority—controlled by the same laws—enjoying equally the blessings it dispenses, and truly brethren of the same family. Is it possible, then, that we can mistake the intention of the framers of this Constitution, or our own rights, so far as to hesitate on the true construction of that clause which secures to the citizens of each State the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?

But, Mr. Chairman, said Mr. S., I have already suggested that my vote of the last session was founded on considerations drawn from this view of our national system. The powers granted to the National Government are granted equally by the whole body of the people. The rights retained are retained equally by all. The Congress, acting under this uniform grant of power, acquires no control over one portion of the nation which it cannot rightfully exert over every other. Its relative sovereignty is the same over the people of Missouri as over the people of every other State in the Confederacy. An abridgment of the powers retained by one portion of the people creates, by the very exercise of such an authority, a separate and distinct frame of National Government, in regard to that community whose political rights are thus extinguished. I will not detain the Committee here by entering into an argument rather foreign to the direct questions before us, drawn from this view of the subject under discussion. The inference which I would rather intimate than establish at this time, will perhaps more clearly suggest itself to the Committee hereafter, when I call their attention to the right reserved to each of the States in relation to its powers of determining to whom the privilege of citizenship, within their respective jurisdictions, shall extend, and the relative rights and condition of its various classes of citizens.

The foundation of this article of the Constitution is laid deep in the structure of the Government. It is capable of no construction which does not plainly denote the universality of its operation and its uniform application to individual right throughout every portion of the nation. By what tenure except this is a citizen of New York invested with the right of inheritance to lands in Ohio? By what other authority are the courts of justice thrown open in Virginia or New York to the citizens of every other State? It is the operation of this clause which reduces us to a perfect equality of rights with those around us, wheresoever we may transfer ourselves in every part of the Republic. The right of acquiring lands by purchase in other States—of devising them to our children—of enforcing private contracts, and an almost infinite variety of civil privileges, are all sustained on this obvious construction of the clause in question. To have omitted it, would, in a Government like ours, have destroyed the whole harmony of the system, and produced the most jarring and discordant conflict of privileges. Without it, the citizens of each State, except in relation to the powers specifically delegated to the Union, would have been altogether aliens and strangers to each other; without any other mutuality of privileges than those derived from their common limited National Confederacy. Instead of inheriting the estates of their ancestors in other States, the law of escheats would have transferred them to foreign sovereignty. The enforcement of private right, if not the security of personal liberty, would have depended on the will or caprice of every State Legislature. Regulations of the most unjust nature might have created and maintained the most odious and oppressive distinctions. The whole tendency of the system would have been to estrange us from each other, and probably in the course of time we should have found in the want of this equality of privileges perhaps the very source of disunion itself. If, sir, as the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Lowndes) seemed to admit, cases might happen in which it would be the duty of Congress to reject the admission of a State into the Union for the repugnancy of its constitution to that of the General Government, can we scarcely imagine a case more deeply affecting the validity of our system, and more calculated to lead to the most dangerous encroachments on private rights and personal liberty than an impugment of this clause of our Constitution.

The power of determining to whom the privilege of citizenship shall extend in the respective States has been vested, or rather was left untouched in the hands of the State Legislatures, with the single exception of the right of Congress to regulate the naturalization of foreigners or aliens. The power thus vested in Congress appears to be necessarily exclusive, and was probably intended to be so. With this diminution only of the sovereignty of the States in this respect, the original power inherent in every Government of determining the extent of the right of citizenship remains unimpaired in the States. It is worthy of remark that, while under the old Confederation, this power in the States extended to the naturalization of aliens, its exercise in some of them had produced serious complaints from the other members of the Confederacy. The adoption of aliens into our political families as citizens by the laws of one State, gave to that class of persons, by one of the articles of the Confederation, privileges of trade, and commerce, and immunities of citizenship, in the rest deemed by many to have been productive of serious inconveniences to their own citizens, and unreasonable interference with their separate interests. The power of extending the benefit of naturalization to aliens, was, therefore, in conformity with the other features of our Government, which were truly national in regard to its external relations, delegated to the General Government. With this exception only, the people of each State still retain and exercise the power of conferring upon all the various classes of persons within their respective State jurisdictions, such rights and privileges as to themselves shall appear most conducive to their interest, and most consonant to their own views of justice, equality, and good government. Whatever inconveniences may be supposed to result from the incidental operation of this power, in relation to the other States, must be attributed therefore to that principle of our Union, without which our National Government would retain as little perhaps of permanency as utility.

The description of persons disfranchised by the proposed constitution of Missouri, have been admitted to the rank of freemen in other States, and recognised as citizens. In the State of New York, for instance, they have in many cases more decisive characteristics of citizens, and enjoy greater privileges than a large class of the free white population, to whom none would deny the character of citizenship. Possessed of the qualifications for suffrage required by her State constitution, they exercise the electoral right of voting for the Executive and Senatorial departments, while a great portion of the free white population, not invested with the same qualifications, enjoy only the subordinate privilege of electing delegates to the House of Assembly, or are deprived altogether of the right of suffrage. As freemen of that State they are represented, even here, by the exercise of their electoral franchise, in virtue of their character as a portion of "the people of the several States," having the "qualifications for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures." It would be no difficult task, by referring to the constitutions and laws of many other States, to point out the same recognition of this class of persons as free citizens; but a more decisive evidence of the soundness of this conclusion, is to be derived from the principles and practice of the National Government itself. The laws of the United States for the protection of American seamen from impressment have been construed (and without question of the correctness of such an interpretation) to extend to this class of persons. As "citizens of the United States," according to the terms of the act, they have uniformly received certificates of protection for their security against the violation of their rights. The impressment of persons of this very description, among others, contributed to our loud and just complaints against the violence of a foreign Power. In the official returns of impressed American citizens heretofore formally communicated to this House will be found many of this class. It was then justly considered that the oppression of seamen of this description, by the agents of a foreign Government involved the violation of our national sovereignty.

To establish a doctrine in relation to this class of persons who have been thus recognised by different States as free citizens, which should deprive them of the benefit of this clause of our national Constitution, would, in many cases deeply affecting their personal rights, be productive of peculiar hardship and injustice. Let us suppose that one of this class, in the State of Missouri, dying intestate, should leave the inheritance of his lands to his children, also free, but residing in Pennsylvania, and there invested with the rights of citizens. What power among us could rightfully be exerted consistently with the privileges secured by the Constitution of the United States, to deprive them of the enjoyment of such an inheritance? What principle of sovereignty reserved by our compact to the State of Missouri could thus limit the operation of the supreme right of Pennsylvania to confer upon the citizens which she had adopted or recognised these privileges?

But the exercise of such a power by the Legislature of Missouri would not only thus defeat one of the greatest blessings of the Union, but might operate as a control on the power of the General Government itself. Let us consider the effect of a measure of this sort, of the Legislature of that State, in its operation on a personal right derived from the United States. I know of no impediment to persons of this description becoming purchasers of the public lands, and deriving title to them from others. In the case, too, of the distribution of the military bounty lands, patents may issue to persons of this class. Inseparably annexed to such a grant is the right of occupation; and can we successfully maintain a doctrine which might in this way indirectly render the State laws of Missouri, if not paramount to the laws of the Union, at least effectual to defeat the rights created under them? From every view of this subject, the conclusion in my mind is inevitable, that the State of Missouri must yield up this assumption of power to the supreme control of the national Constitution. The citizens of the other States must enjoy within her jurisdiction all the rights, privileges, and immunities of citizens, subject to no restraints or conditions not equally imposed on the citizens of Missouri herself. If the arbitrary (I mean not, despotic) distinction created in her Constitution can be maintained, she might with equal right extend it much further, and deny to all citizens of other States who had not, for instance, reached the age of forty years, or who shall be born after her admission into the Union, the right of emigration to the State.

Is Missouri, then, already an independent State, and the resolution now proposed merely declaratory of that fact? The honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWNDES,) if I understood him rightly, considered that when the people of Missouri, in their convention, called by virtue of the fourth section of the act of the last session, had answered the question that it was expedient to form a constitution of State government, their right of self-government as a State commenced. It was evident that this right must have been derived, if at all, from this section, and by authority conferred by the Congress, who were invested by the Constitution with the sovereignty over her. She could acquire no right to proceed to call a convention—to propound the question, or to form any constitution whatever, without our previous consent that she should exercise such powers. To determine, then, whether, by virtue of the authority given by the act, and in conformity to its provisions, (under which she has professed to act,) the power thus conferred has been executed on her part, it is first necessary to fix the fair and reasonable interpretation of the act itself. To establish this, it will not be necessary to travel out of the very section under which is supposed that this right of self-government, as an independent State, has been created. The members of the convention were by this section of the act directed at their meeting first to determine, “whether it be or be not expedient at that time to form a constitution and State government for the people within the said Territory, &c., and, if it be deemed expedient, the convention shall be, and are, authorized to form a constitution and State government,” &c. “Provided, That the same, whenever formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.” If the authority contained in this section conferred on the people of Missouri an unqualified power to form their constitution in such manner and with such provisions as they might in their own discretion choose to adopt, the authority has perhaps been executed, and they might be entitled to the benefit of the grant contained in the act. But, to my mind, no such authority was ever granted by Congress. The proviso which is annexed is, in the most liberal sense, strictly a condition, qualifying, throughout, the whole power granted in the section, and, without conformity to its spirit, no exercise of the power contemplated by the act could be valid or effectual, for any purpose, against the sovereignty of the United States. If Missouri seeks, therefore, to establish her independence as a State by virtue of the power thus conferred, she has acquired the right in violation of the very authority under which she claims. The conformity of her constitution to that of the United States was obligatory on the convention. No power has been granted to form any constitution of civil government whatever which should not strictly accord to the National Constitution. Much less can the erection of a frame of government violating it, in one of its most essential provisions, be deemed to have been an execution of the authority granted in this section. The whole of this section must be construed together, and the qualification contained in the proviso extends its operation as well to the power of propounding the general question to the convention as to the actual formation of the proposed constitution. The question to be put to the convention was, substantially, Is it now expedient to form a constitution of State government, in conformity to the authority conferred by Congress? As this constitution is therefore repugnant to that of the United States, and to the very power under which it has professedly been made, the authority contained in the act of the last session cannot be deemed to have been executed at all. Between Missouri and the Congress, she stands on the same ground as if the convention had never met. The course of argument which has been urged against this conclusion would have equally maintained a proposition that Missouri was an independent State, had the convention, after determining that it was expedient to form a constitution, proceeded even to the creation of a monarchy. The dispensation of the condition that her government should be republican might as well, and by the same course of reasoning, been granted, as that of conformity to our National Constitution. Indeed, sir, it may well be considered that, had neither of these conditions been expressed in the act, Missouri would still have been bound to have conformed to them both.

The Congress themselves possess no power to authorize the people of the Territories to form constitutions, preparatory to their admission into the Union, which shall not conform to that of the United States. Such a power as this would defeat the very end of the Government, inasmuch as it would necessarily be a subversion of the Constitution itself. Conditions of this sort are deemed to be tacitly, and of political necessity, annexed to every authority of this kind granted by Congress. There is, in the case of Missouri, another condition, also, contained in the same proviso: that the Legislature of the State “shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil by the United States.” Could it be reasonably or successfully maintained that a constitution containing a palpable violation of this reservation, would have been a compliance with the authority granted by this act? Nor is this all—there is one further condition: that the Legislature shall never interfere with “any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in such soil to the bona fide purchasers.” The precise import of the regulations here intended may not be very clearly understood; but the title to the public lands could hardly be deemed to be secured by Congress in any way, so long as it was considered competent in the Legislature of Missouri to deny the right of occupation and enjoyment of them to any class of purchasers. Had the convention have failed to have provided, "by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States," for the security of the terms stated in the proviso to the 6th section of the act, could she have claimed the benefit of the donations granted in the propositions offered to her in the same section? Certainly not; and for the reason that this proviso operates also as a condition, the performance of which is indispensable to the perfection of those grants. There is yet another condition secured, by way of proviso, in the second section of the act: that "the said State shall have concurrent jurisdiction in the river Mississippi, so far as the said river shall form" its common boundary with other States, and that it shall be "forever free, as well to the inhabitants of the said State, as to other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll therefor, imposed by the said State." Had the convention, disregarding this reservation to the citizens of the United States, expressly authorized the Legislature to impose a transit duty on the navigation of the river, would the States of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, recognise in such an infringement of their rights a compliance with the authority granted by this act? Would Missouri be recognised as an independent State, had she set at naught all these conditions, thus annexed to the power under which her convention acted? If the failure to conform to these conditions, which originate chiefly from expediency, would have deprived her, as a State government, of the privileges depending on their performance, much less can she claim the right of self-government, having failed to comply with that higher and more indispensable condition—a strict conformity to the Constitution of the United States.

But, sir, independent of any objections to the passage of this resolution, arising out of the act of the last session, I cannot reconcile it to my own sense of duty to give to it my sanction, so long as my opinion is that this clause of her constitution is repugnant to the Constitution under which I here act. Had Missouri established an hereditary Senate, or framed a government composed of King, Lords, and Commons, acting on the same principle, I should deem it no more an impugnement, except in a higher degree, of our Constitution, than in the case now before us. Missouri cannot become a party to our national compact, except on the terms of the compact itself. Any other union between us, as States, would create a political solecism in the Confederacy. It may, indeed, be true, that clauses may be found in some of the constitutions of the old States, equally repugnant to the national Constitution. I have not been able to examine them thoroughly, but, as most of these constitutions were framed previous to the adoption of the present Constitution of the Union in such States, all clauses of this sort have been virtually abrogated by the people by the adoption of our present system in the subsequent conventions called for its ratification. Had one of the original States, however, on acceding to the Union, ratified the Constitution, with the exception of any particular article or clause, it would hardly have been contended that she should have been received into the Confederacy. For my own part, I cannot distinguish between this case and that of Missouri. In the one the State would probably have been excluded from the Union for withholding its assent to the powers granted to the National Government; in the other, the impugnement of the rights secured by the Constitution in effect abrogates one of its articles, and equally forms an exception in her assent to the same powers. The insertion of this condition into the act of the last session, is virtually an acknowledgment, on the part of the Congress, of the necessity of universally maintaining a strict conformity to the Constitution in the formation of new States.

To preserve in its original harmony the distribution of powers, under our complex system, it is not of less importance to maintain the powers of the General Government, and the privileges secured under it, than to resist its encroachments on the sovereignty of the States. The perpetuity of the whole system depends, in the chiefest degree, on the most watchful vigilance in the National Legislature on every Constitutional point. If this clause in the constitution of Missouri was clearly susceptible of an interpretation so limited in its application as not to be mistaken, I would cheerfully submit it to her own Legislature; but, to my mind, its terms are too comprehensive to enable me to arrive at such a conclusion. I have wished, indeed, that it were so, for the sake of allaying, in some measure, the excitement which has convulsed the nation. This unhappy subject seems destined, however, still to distract the national councils, and scatter discontent throughout the Union. Wherever it is met, at every step we seem to tread upon thorns.

Deeply as I regret the necessity which compels me to vote against this resolution, I do not apprehend the consequences which many imagine may be the result of our proceedings. Be they, however, what they may, I cannot, on a question affecting the Constitution, take them into my consideration. Although Missouri must, by the determination of Congress, remain a Territory still, the necessity of that coercion to any portion of the country, alluded to by the gentleman who has preceded me in this discussion, I hope is yet very far distant. Whenever the period arrives that shall render it necessary to unite the States by the arm of force, the Confederacy dissolves with the moral principle which is the foundation of our Union. It is this which pre-eminently distinguishes us from the Governments of the Old World. While in other countries Government is chiefly felt in the oppression of its citizens, and only maintained by the exertion of power in its most odious aspect, it is here known only by the blessings which it silently dispenses, and sustained by the moral sentiment of the people. Coercion may be the foundation of good government in a penitentiary or a mad-house, but, in our Republic, where military force begins there union ends. But sir, there is a fund of good sense remaining among us, and a warm attachment to our institutions pervading the hearts of our countrymen, which, when called into action, will yet heal the wounded spirits of all. The inestimable blessings of our Union are too deeply felt and valued to be lightly or rashly thrown away. The South and the North, odious as these appellations are, have found it hitherto the safety of all our rights, and will yet confidently cherish it as the sanctuary of all our liberties.

Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, of Virginia, took the floor. He had not expected, he said, to have engaged in the discussion to-day, and should necessarily, therefore, speak without preparation; but he promised the Committee, that, in the few remarks which he should submit, he should observe every possible degree of brevity.

The subject now under consideration, he said, was one which had become painful to the nation, and, he feared, painful to the House. But it was one to be decided, and it was his most earnest wish that the decision should be such as to avert any possible evil foreseen by any of the gentlemen who had discussed the subject.

The member from New York, (Mr. STORRS,) and the member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) while they had denied to Missouri the condition of a State, would not undertake to say to the Committee what would be the condition of the people of Missouri should this resolution not pass. That question, they said, was not now before the Committee; when, however, it should be presented at some after time, and in some other shape, they would endeavor to decide it as under the circumstance should then appear to be right. But, Mr. B. said, it is a question which must, at this moment, enter into the consideration of every member of this Committee, what is the condition of Missouri? It is a question, the decision and consequences of which are much and intimately connected with the immediate question now submitted to the Committee.

Is Missouri a State, or is she a Territory? If she be a State, she is a sovereign and independent State, unconnected with the Confederacy, or a State deriving the rights, and subject to the obligations, which the Federal compact devolves upon every State in the Union? These are questions which must be decided in some shape, because they must be practically acted upon. Missouri is a Government; she has an Executive, a Legislature, a Judiciary—a portion of which at least have been in action. Are we, said Mr. B., prepared to recall them? Are we prepared to say to Missouri, your Legislature has no legislative powers, your Governor no executive powers? Are we prepared to say to her, you shall revert to your territorial condition, under which we are authorized to legislate for you? Is there any member of the Committee who will rise in his place and take that ground? He presumed not; and, if not, he asked, what is her condition? It is this: the people of a portion of the territory of the United States were authorized to form a constitution and State government, and, having formed such State government, were to be received into the Union of these States on an equal footing with every other State. What is it that makes a State? Is it not the formation of a constitution—the creation of departments of government—the delineation of the manner in which the power of the people shall be exercised by their Representatives, and the distribution of that power among the agents of the people? Has this been done in Missouri? It has. The member from New York had acknowledged, that if Missouri be a State, she is a State in this Union. Mr. B. said he imagined the gentleman was driven to this conclusion: for, if Missouri be a State, and not one of the United States, in what relation does the Government of the United States stand to her? In what character does it stand as to the public lands, the navigation of her rivers, the revenue, and the various other relations of the United States to that Territory? Will it be contended, said he, that we can impose Federal obligations unless she has Federal rights? No, said Mr. B., unless she be a State of the Union, we have no control, no power over her. It might even be questioned, if she was denied to be a State of the Union, what is the extent of the claim which we have to lands within the territorial extent of that State. These, Mr. B. said, were questions which, in the view that he should take of the subject, he would not discuss further, than to say, that, by the provisions of the act of the last session, the people of Missouri were authorized to form a constitution and State government. They have done so. When they had done so, by the force of that law they were to be a State. That period has passed; and they are a State of right, and entitled to all the privileges of that condition.

What, said Mr. B., is the provision of the Constitution which has been referred to as being violated? It is, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." And this provision of the Constitution was said to be contradicted by the constitution of Missouri, because a clause in the latter enjoins on the Legislature to pass such laws for the exclusion from the State of people of a certain description. To maintain this proposition, the opponents of Missouri would have to make out that the persons thus proposed to be excluded are citizens of the States. The member from Pennsylvania had yesterday told the House that he would not undertake to say what a citizen is. In that particular, Mr. B. said, in his estimation, the gentleman did not perform a duty which devolved on him. On whom, in this case, did the burden of proof devolve? We, said Mr. B., offer the constitution of a new State, formed under the authority of law. You oppose it, because you say it is incompatible with the Constitution of the United States. With what provision is it incompatible? With that which has been already stated. Did it not then belong to gentlemen who oppose the admission of Missouri to show, that those people whom she proposes to exclude are citizens, in the sense of the Constitution of the United States, before they asserted that the constitution of Missouri was irreconcilable with that of the United States?

The gentleman from Pennsylvania would not say affirmatively what makes a citizen, but he said that, to constitute a man a citizen, it was not indispensable that he should have a right of voting. To make any reasoning conclusive, Mr. B. said, we must distinctly see, in the outset, what one side admits, and what the other denies. To know this was indispensable to a correct conclusion on any disputed point. Let us then inquire, said he, who are citizens? For, in his humble opinion, that point, which the member from Pennsylvania did not choose to discuss, lay at the root of this question, and its decision was unavoidable.

I will undertake, said Mr. B., what the member from Pennsylvania would not. I will define what is meant by the term citizen—what are the qualities which constitute citizenship. He might mistake, he said, in this position; but, according to the best lights he had, it was correct; and if so, it would seem to lead to a conclusion directly contrary to that drawn by the member from Pennsylvania. The term citizen, Mr. B. said, could not with propriety be applied to any one unless under these circumstances: that he should be possessed of all at least of the civil rights, if not of the political, of every other person in the community, under like circumstances, of which he is not deprived for some cause personal to himself.

If, said he, I am correct in this definition, let us proceed to apply it to the people who are the subject of this inquiry, and see how far their condition places them within the scope of it.

This, however, was not the view of the question which he rose for the purpose of presenting. In the view which he was about to take, he should proceed upon the supposition that the constitution of Missouri was properly before the Committee for consideration, and that the true inquiry was, does this constitution contain, or not, any provision incompatible with the superior provisions of the Federal Constitution? It would be his endeavor to show that it does not. Whatever opinion he might entertain of the condition of the State, or of the powers of this House in relation to it, it did not impinge on the view that he should present, which admitted, for the opponents of Missouri, the position most favorable to them, that the constitution was now properly submitted for consideration,* and for the examination of the question whether it contains any provision in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Before he proceeded to do this, however, he said, he would dismiss the objections which might be offered to the definition which he had taken the liberty to give. It might be said, for example, that even in Virginia one white man is entitled to a particular right, while another is not. Still, Mr. B. said, his definition applied, because all under like circumstances had like rights. Show me, in Virginia, said he, or in any other State with the laws of which I am acquainted, any white man who is deprived of the rights of other white men similarly circumstanced. Every white man of Virginia who has a freehold votes. Females do not vote; but all females do not vote. All white persons in Virginia may sue and be sued; all are entitled to the great civil rights of personal liberty and the free possession and enjoyment of personal property. It was no objection, therefore, to the definition which Mr. B. had presented, that, in a community, there were distinctions, some having rights which others have not; because they were not in like circumstances. A young man under the age of twenty-one years cannot make a will; but all persons under like circumstances are subject to the same disability. A man above forty-five years of age is exempted from militia duty; but all above the age of forty-five are exempt. Show me an instance, said Mr. B., in any State in this Union, where, among white men, rights are enjoyed by some which are forbidden to others under like circumstances. It cannot be shown.

Is there, then, said he, pursuing the purpose of his argument, a State of this Union in which colored men have all the civil rights of any other citizen in the community to which they belong? He proceeded to examine the laws of the several States on this subject. In Virginia, a colored man—yes, even a slave, and of that class over whom it was supposed, by those unacquainted with facts, that so much tyranny was exercised—is secured against at least one undue degree of personal violence. The free man of color rises higher—to the dignity of the right to sue and to be sued, to acquire property, to make contracts. He was yet under one signal political disability—he is not allowed the right of suffrage; and under an important civil disability, not being allowed to give testimony in any suit in which a white man is a party. In North Carolina, persons of this description are indulged in the highest political privilege, the right of suffrage, and are yet deprived of the privilege of giving testimony in any case in which a white man is a party—a privilege which can only be wrested from a white man for some cause particular to himself. In Virginia, further, in regard to manumitted slaves, considering them as hostile to public peace, as the brand of discord between the whites and another class of persons, it was declared, by the law, that every manumitted slave should, within twelve months after the act of manumission, leave the State, or forfeit the rights he had acquired.

Mr. B. said he would not, as he might, go further into detail on this point: it was sufficient to say, in general, that free people of color are in all the States deprived of many of the rights of white men. Was there any State in the Union in which they were in the full enjoyment of civil rights? Mr. B. said he took some degree of interest in looking to the laws of Massachusetts in regard to this description of people, who, it had been said, enjoyed in that State an unqualified equality with the whites. But he found, on examination, it was otherwise. He found a penalty was imposed by law of fifty pounds on any minister who marries a white with a colored person, and it was declared, that any such marriages should be null and void in law—and on what grounds? Not upon the ground of crime in the parties, carrying with it disability. Was it not upon the ground of the disqualification of one of the parties to make that particular contract? How disqualified? Because of his color, certainly. The party may be of age—in the exercise of his sound senses; he may be able to make contracts in relation to property; but, in regard to marriage—in that particular in which, above all other things, we ought to pursue our own happiness, in our own way, he may not contract, but under certain circumstances, that is, with a person of color. Whom God has joined, let no man put asunder—but in old Massachusetts they do put asunder the colored person who intermarries with the white.

We find, then, said Mr. B., that in the East and North, as well as in the South and West, there are certain distinctions growing out of color. They are distinctions founded in the best good sense, in the preservation of public morality and of the dignity of our nature, and in the consideration that between the whites and the blacks there never can be an incorporation which is calculated to add to the happiness or elevate the dignity of either party. Mr. B. asked, in further illustration of the denial of civil rights, even in the Eastern States, to colored persons, whether a colored man had ever been known to sit on a jury? He was told not. This attempt to maintain a principle in theory, which was abandoned in practice, forcibly reminded him of an incident in Roman history. It was known that there was a long and severe contest in that republic between the patricians and the plebeians, in relation to a claim set up by the latter, of the right of being elected to the Consulship; and yet, after this pretension was acquiesced in, a century perhaps elapsed before any plebeian was actually elected. Was there any other State in this Union, Mr. B. asked, which had declared the free man of color to be equal in his civil and political rights to the white man? If so, he called on gentlemen to produce it.

There was a time, Mr. B. went on to say, when the man of color and the white man were not equal in any part of this country, even in theory. The population which came to this country from abroad were Europeans or the descendants of Europeans. They found the aborigines here, but, as far as they came from abroad, they were of European birth or descent. This other race, said Mr. B., got among us afterwards. I deeply regret that they did. When they came, they were slaves. He called upon gentlemen to show the words, in any of the State constitutions, which declare that a man of color, become or born free, shall be elevated to the grade of the whites. He would refer, he said, to some clauses in constitutions on which he supposed gentlemen would rely to prove this; but he would show that those clauses would not bear them out.

Do you find it, said he, in the constitution of New York or of Massachusetts, that free people of color shall vote? No; you will find that every male person or male inhabitant shall vote; and, under this clause, it is said that free persons of color have equal rights with the whites. If upon that construction, these persons are considered as citizens, who else are not? Aliens are male persons. Were gentlemen prepared to say, that an Englishman or an Irishman, having a six months residence, and being a free citizen, should have a right to vote at all elections? He would state a case yet more impressive, deriving an argument from the condition of certain unhappy remnants of the aborigines lingering out their wretched lives among the inhabitants of these States; there were some of those persons in Massachusetts and some in other States. Are they not free persons? Yet, do you suffer them to vote, or to sue and be sued? Do you receive them as witnesses? Are they entitled to those civil, much less those political rights, which are required to constitute them a part of the body politic? Was ever one of them a juror or a witness? Can they elect or be elected to any office? Can they hold property, except under regulations which are prescribed to them, and prescribed, too, by legislatures in which they are not represented? They cannot. What is the distinction between their case and that of the free people of color? They equally come into the definition of male persons and male inhabitants. Would any gentleman contend that Indians are citizens of every State in the Union, because they reside within any one of them? He presumed not.

It seemed to him, Mr. BARBOUR said, that, on a review of all the facts connected with this subject, it would be found, that free persons of color have been considered a non-descript class. In some States, they have some civil rights; in others, more. In some States they have some political rights; in others, none. It never had entered, he was persuaded, into the mind of any member of the Legislature of any State that they were citizens, under the definition which he had laid down. Had Virginia, he asked, violated the Constitution of the United States when she said that persons of color made free should depart her territory? He presumed no gentleman would contend that she had. If not, how could it be said, that she had a right to get rid of persons of that description already within her limits, and yet that she could not exclude a new torrent of that population attempted to be poured in upon her?

The member from New York had put to the Committee a number of cases, all of which Mr. B. said, if he mistook not, were susceptible of a ready answer. It would be found, indeed, that most of them were but different statements of the same proposition, and at last depend on the application of a principle. Suppose, said the gentleman, one of these persons residing in New York to acquire a right to a patent to land in Missouri; and shall he be entitled to the fee simple, and yet not entitled to occupancy of the land? The gentleman would see, Mr. B. said, that the free negro of Virginia had the same right to acquire property in Virginia as the free negro in New York could have to acquire it in Missouri; yet, being by law excluded from the State, he could not occupy it. The gentleman's argument proved, therefore, that, quo ad the right of purchase, the free people of color had civil rights, but not that they have all civil rights. Could it be argued because they had one civil right, that they therefore have all? Might it not as well be argued, because a man has one political right, he therefore has all political rights?

With respect to the power of naturalization, the gentleman from New York had correctly stated that the States have a right to declare who shall be citizens thereof respectively. Ay, said Mr. B., have they so? Has not Missouri, then, the right to say who shall be entitled to citizenship within her limits? Or is she alone to be kept in a state of pupillage, and are we to say to her now, as gentlemen wished to have said to her at the last session, you shall not have all the rights enjoyed by the other States of the Union? If Missouri says that certain persons shall not be her citizens, has any other State a right to say such persons shall be your citizens, whether you will or not? Did not the right, the existence of which had been acknowledged by the gentleman from New York, involve a power of making its exercise effectual? It was idle to say that a State had a right to decide this question, and yet that other persons had a right to overrule that decision, and be its citizens whether it would or not.

Mr. B. said he knew that the powers of the States had been greatly abridged by constructions of the Constitution. He feared they would be yet more so. But he hoped it would not be here contended, that the rights of a State shall be so far abridged as that it shall not have power to protect its own safety and its own morals. If a man afflicted with a pestilent disease approached the shore of a State, there was certainly a right to keep him off. If vagabonds and fugitives from justice infest a State, they may certainly be expelled from it. What was the consequence of such a preservative power? We in the Southern States, said Mr. B., consider this description of population the most dangerous to the community that can possibly be conceived. They are just enough elevated to have some sense of liberty, and yet not the capacity to estimate or enjoy all its rights, if they had them—and being between two societies, above one and below the other, they are in the most dissatisfied state. They are themselves perpetual monuments of discontent, and firebrands to the other class of their own color. And if the time ever come when the flames of servile war enwrap this Union in a general blaze, perhaps we may have to look to them as the primary cause of such horrors. Has not a State, then, a right to get rid of them? They are not citizens in Missouri, and Missouri has as much right to say they should not be, as Massachusetts had to say that a black man shall not, within her limits, marry a white woman. Has not Missouri a right to send off beyond her limits persons of color when free? Virginia has done it, and Missouri must have the same right as Virginia. And here Mr. B. repeated his question, had Missouri a power to get rid of all the free people of color now there, and yet not the power to prevent others from going there?

He wished, he said, to put to some members of this House a case, to see how far they would go. He should suppose the persons of color in the State of Virginia, of a particular description, exceeded four hundred thousand in number. Although not willing to be dictated to by any other Government on earth, yet said Mr. B. there is, in Virginia, a sentiment, more or less prevailing among many of our people, that if a scheme of general emancipation could be devised, practicable in its character, it would be desirable that it should take place. If, in progress of time, our political society should shake its encumbered lap, and throw off this description of its property and people, should we have a right to say to them, go off, four or five thousand of you, into Pennsylvania, and settle there? What would Pennsylvania say? Would she not say, that free persons of color are, by their present experience, an intolerable nuisance to her society? If she finds such inconvenience from twenty or thirty thousand such persons, generally born free, and accustomed to the partial exercise of civil rights, what would she say to an irruption of such a host of men, who had just been relieved from the yoke of servitude, and in a more lawless condition than any other that can be conceived? Yet, according to the doctrine now contended for, she must submit to it, having no power to refuse them admission into her territory. I wish gentlemen from that and other States to recollect, said Mr. B., that the time may come, when they will feel more anxiety on this subject, than I possibly can now.

Indians, free negroes, mulattoes, slaves! Tell me not, said Mr. B., that the Constitution, when it speaks of We, the people, means these. The argument in favor of including in the class of citizens free people of color, goes too far; it applies equally to the Indian and to the slave.

Mr. B. said he felt no difficulty, then, in coming to these conclusions: That the Constitution of the United States was framed by the States respectively, consisting of the European descendants of white men; that it had a view to the liberty and rights of white men; that, with regard to all this colored class, it was a description of people whom that Constitution did not mean to meddle with, only in the particular view in which they are expressly referred to, viz. with regard to representation. With regard to the individuals of this class, the Constitution of the United States had no reference to them or their rights, real or supposed. And why not? Because the framers of the Constitution well knew that every State in the Union, in its isolated character, was abundantly competent to the protection of the mere rights of persons and of property, where that right existed. We, the white people, wanted, not merely to exist, but we formed a Constitution to condense the will of our fellow-citizens, and to borrow the arm of a mighty people for our protection against foreign encroachments. The poor slave and the free man of color are sufficiently protected by the States. The States can give to the latter the right to sue and be sued, &c., and can protect them in every thing absolutely necessary to personal comfort and the preservation of life and property; can confer on them every thing except the great character of equality in all respects with the whites. Did we, said Mr. B., ever think it necessary to form a confederacy for the security of our property, of our lives, or of the correct administration of civil laws? No; we looked to Europe; we saw her map cut up into small squares and patches of territory—every nation hostile or rival to its neighbor, finding an enemy wherever it crossed a line. We foresaw that, among our States, too, if they remained separate and disunited sovereignties, there would be collisions of interest, on territorial and commercial questions, &c., producing animosity and wars; we entered into the federative compact to enable us to avoid a border war at home, and to resist aggression from abroad. In relation to these people of color, nothing was intended by that compact, their personal liberty and private property being abundantly secured by the laws of the several States. This was the substance of Mr. B.'s argument on this point.

With regard to precedents, Mr. B. said, he was not much in the habit of referring to them; he wished he could never hear the word in this House. But it appeared to him to be a modest request, when arguments drawn from them were continually used, to be allowed to call one to his aid. What, then, were the precedents bearing on this question? It is provided, by the Constitution of the United States, that Congress may establish a uniform rule of naturalization. Did Congress ever pass a law to naturalize people of color? On the contrary, every word of every naturalization law speaks of whites only. If, said he, we had gone abroad on such principles of knight-errantry; if we had broken down the barriers which separate the races of men, and, like the French Convention, tendered fraternity to them and all the world, we should have had a short and wild career of it, &c. Mr. B. went on to say, that stature, and other corporal qualities, had never been made the cause of distinctions in society; but color had constantly, for centuries past, been a mark of discrimination; it had been the fate of one color to be perpetually subordinate to the other.

But was this the only illustration to be drawn from the Constitution? No; there was another. Congress are invested with the power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia. Who, said Mr. B., are the militia? The great body of every people, who are capable of military duty, subject to such regulations as the Legislature may impose. Men may be exempted, from causes particular to themselves. But the term militia includes the great body of a people contributing to the defence of their common country. Why have Congress, in their laws in execution of this provision, introduced the same words, "white men?" If colored persons are entitled to all the rights which belong to our fellow-citizens of a different complexion, how is it that, whilst every white man is authorized to bear arms, that description of men is excluded? It shows that there is something in color, more than in other circumstances, which separate the two classes.

Mr. B., in recapitulating his arguments on this head, said that he trusted he had said enough to show that free people of color were not citizens, in the same light as white persons are citizens, in the respective States. He proceeded then to make a few incidental remarks in regard to other views of this subject.

Suppose, for argument's sake, what it had been the purpose of the remarks he had already made, to deny. Give to the opponents of Missouri the aspect of this question which is the worst for its friends. Concede that one clause of the constitution of Missouri is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States. Does the nullity of one clause destroy the whole instrument? It was painful to him to appeal to professional principles in this House, but it was consistent with reason, as well as a plain and well known maxim of law, that a single vicious clause does not vitiate a whole instrument. Are we to have here, said Mr. B., in the discussion of great Federal concerns, a degree of technicality in objections to a constitution of a State which a court of law would not sustain in regard to any written instrument? Because one clause of a hundred and fifty amounts to nothing, do the remaining hundred and forty-nine also come to nothing, and all become bad? On the contrary, Mr. B. said, he had always understood that, nothing being taken from nothing, nothing remains. Mr. B. illustrated his views on this point by stating a parallel case. Congress has a clear power to lay import duties; it is just as clear that Congress has not the power to lay export duties. Suppose the chairman of the Committee of Commerce should bring in a bill, and it were possible that the bill should pass Congress, one clause of which imposed an export duty, and another an import duty. Would that clause which exceeds the powers of Congress make void the other, which is clearly within them? Perhaps, gentlemen might say, this was an extreme case. Granted, Mr. B. said. He would put another: There were certain powers of this Government which had been the bone of contention for years past, amongst which was the power to establish a bank. Suppose, in a law on any other subject, should be introduced a section exercising this power, and the Judges of the Supreme Court should think—no, they would not; he wished they would so think—that that part of the law was unconstitutional, would that make the rest of the law void? No; it would not. As much liberality at least, Mr. B. said, ought to be found in a legislative body when discussing fundamental principles of Government, as was to be found in courts of law.

The gentleman from New York said that, confessedly, a large portion of the free people of color in the United States were not citizens, and had asked for a construction of the constitution of Missouri which would embrace those who are. Now this again, Mr. B. said, was contrary to the rule of law; for, if a contract was made by two individuals, by one construction of which it was good, by another void, even a court of justice would give it that construction which would give it validity.

He stated another case, by way of illustration. No State can, according to the Constitution, without the consent of Congress, lay any duties on imports or exports. There are, then, certain duties which States may lay. Suppose a State Legislature, in laying taxes which it has a right to lay, should, contrary to the Constitution, lay an impost duty. Would a construction be given to it which, for that fault, would vitiate the whole act? Surely not. Mr. B. added some other illustrations, all tending to the same end, that, admitting (which he denied) that the clause objected to was contrary to the Constitution, it was no argument against the remainder, to which no exception had been pretended to be taken.

With regard to the question of leaving the contested and at the worst doubtful clause to be construed by the judiciary, need he argue, Mr. B. asked, that if a State constitution opposed the Constitution of the United States, it is just as void as the law of a State which comes in conflict with the same constitution? On that point, there was no doubt. It was perfectly immaterial, whether an unconstitutional provision was found in the constitution or law of a State; it was in each equally void. Do not gentlemen see, then, that they fight about a shadow? He called on them to recollect the difference of construction in regard to the powers of the State and Federal Governments. The latter possesses no power but that which is expressly given. Directly the converse of this is the rule in relation to the former. The Legislature of Missouri, whether the clause excepted to be in or out of the Constitution, possesses precisely the same power. Whenever they came to exercise it, would arise the question whether to legislate as proposed would or would not be to legislate uselessly, being contrary to the Constitution of the United States.

Suppose, Mr. B. said, this House were to declare this constitution of Missouri to be consistent with the Constitution of the United States; yet, if a free person arriving in Missouri, applied for the benefit of the act of habeas corpus, would he not, if the act under which he was seized appeared to be contrary to the Constitution of the United States, be delivered and set at liberty? Certainly he would; and the converse was true that, declaring the constitution of Missouri to be compatible with the Federal Constitution would not make it so. The Judiciary, said Mr. B., will, if the constitution be left as it is, decide this question when it comes up. What they say will be operative; what we say will not.

It was a question of extreme difficulty to decide, what powers do and what do not belong to this Government, or to the State governments. Shall we, then, said Mr. B., embarrass ourselves with the decision of questions thus difficult, and respecting which our decision, be it one way or the other, will be wholly inoperative?

Mr. B. concluded the speech, of which the preceding is an outline merely, by saying that he now came back, and closed with the proposition, that the constitution of Missouri is not inconsistent with the Federal Constitution, because, as respects the class of people there referred to, they are not citizens in the sense of the term in which it is employed in the Constitution of the United States.

When Mr. BARBOUR concluded, there seemed not to be a disposition in any person to rise.

Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia, said that he wished to present his views on the subject, but was not prepared to do so this afternoon. He therefore asked that the Committee should rise, and ask leave to sit again.

The Committee, however, refused to rise.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, that he, too, wished to address the House on this question, but was prevented from doing so to-day by bodily indisposition.

Another motion for the Committee to rise was negatived.

At length, however, after one or two more refusals, the Committee rose and reported the resolution to the House; and, after several ineffectual attempts, a motion at length prevailed to lay it on the table.

SATURDAY, December 9.

Among the petitions presented to-day, was one by Mr. WENDOVER, from the Mercantile Society of the city of New York, praying for an imposition of a duty of ten per cent. on sales at auction; also for the establishment of an uniform system of bankruptcy; and for such a modification of the tariff of duties on imports, as is demanded by the best interests of the nation.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill, making a partial appropriation for the military service of the United States for the year 1821; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. COCKE, the Secretary of War was directed to communicate to this House any information he may possess, tending to show whether the order given by Colonel King, of the fourth regiment of infantry, to shoot deserters taken in the fact, was approved by any general officer in the service of the United States, or known to, or passed over in silence by him, as stated in the defence of said Colonel King before a court-martial, sitting in the State of Alabama, in the year 1819; and, also, any information he may possess, showing that corporal punishment has been inflicted on any soldier, whereby he came to his death; and, if any, by whose order it was inflicted, and what measures have been taken relative thereto.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the times for issuing land warrants to soldiers of the Revolution, and for locating the same.

Mr. COOK submitted the following resolution: Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing Benjamin Stephenson to locate four hundred and ninety-five acres of land in the State of Illinois, as a compensation for that quantity granted by the State of Virginia to George Hite, in the State of Kentucky, which, upon resurvey, was found to have been previously patented to another person, and which was transferred to the said Stephenson by the said Hite.

DECEMBER, 1820.

Upon this resolution the SPEAKER observed, that the more regular, and, he thought, the only correct practice was for the party asking relief, to set out his claim in a memorial or petition, addressed to the House.

After some remarks from Messrs. CULPEPER and COCKE, against the practice, and Mr. COOK, in support of the resolution, it was negatived.

On motion of Mr. RANKIN, the Committee on Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry at the mouth of Pearl river, in the State of Mississippi.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the latest return made to the Treasury Department of the general state of the Bank of the United States, and its offices of discount and deposit, in pursuance of the resolution of the 5th instant; which letter and statement were ordered to lie on the table.

An engrossed bill entitled "An act to amend the act, entitled 'An act to alter the times of session of the circuit and district courts in the District of Columbia,'" was read the third time, and passed.

MISSOURI.

The House having resumed the consideration of the resolve declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union,

Mr. A. SMYTH, of Virginia, having obtained the floor, addressed the Chair. He said that the Constitution of the United States contains a clause that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" and the constitution formed for the State of Missouri contains a clause making it the duty of the Legislature of that State to pass such laws as may be necessary "to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, that State, under any pretext whatsoever;" and it has become a question whether the clause in the constitution of Missouri is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. He would attempt, he said, to show that there was no such repugnance.

The Constitution of the United States provides that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. This can only apply to citizens who are, in their own States, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens. Can it be shown that free negroes are such citizens in any one of the States as are entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens? A citizen is he who is entitled to the freedom and privileges of the body politic, and has a share in its government. In Rome every citizen was enrolled in one of the thirty-five tribes, and, consequently, had the right of suffrage. When we apply the term "citizens" to the inhabitants of States, it means those who are members of the political community.

The civil law determined the condition of the son by that of the father. A man whose father was not a citizen was allowed to be a perpetual inhabitant, but not a citizen, unless citizenship was conferred on him. I consider him as a citizen of the United States who is entitled to every personal right of a civil and political nature common to the great body of the political community. The distinguishing characteristic of a citizen of the United States is the possession of those capacities which a foreigner obtains by naturalization. Those are, 1st a capacity to take a freehold; 2d to vote at elections; 3d to be elected, having the requisite qualifications of age, residence, and property. He who possesses these capacities is a citizen of the United States, within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution under consideration; and he who does not possess these capacities is not. The free negro is not entitled to those civil and political rights in the United States, or in any State that adopted the Constitution. Let the State constitution be shown, which declares the free negro to be entitled to all the rights of citizenship, or the code of State laws that places him on an equality in all respects as to privileges with the white citizen.

The Revolution found the negro in America, a slave. Where are the acts or constitutions which have declared him a citizen, entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States? They have no existence. He is everywhere inferior to the white man, as well by the laws of the States as of the United States. In the State of Massachusetts, always foremost in the work of liberty, the free negro is under considerable disabilities—one of which is, that he is not enrolled in the militia. If he comes into that State from another, he must show a certificate from the Secretary of State of his freedom, or he will be seized and deported. In Delaware free negroes convicted of larceny may be sold. If one of them comes into that State from another, he forfeits ten dollars per week for the time of his stay, and if he does not pay the penalty he is sold. In Virginia the free negro has no political, and very few civil rights. He is forbidden to come into that State; and if he does come, he is seized and removed. In Ohio he is not permitted to vote, and in North Carolina, although he is allowed the right of suffrage, yet he, and his posterity to the third generation, are refused the privilege of giving testimony in a court of justice, where a white man is a party. By the laws of the United States the negro is refused the privilege of being naturalized; and in the code adopted for the government of this District, (which is the laws of the adjacent States,) it is provided that, on the trial of a free negro for a crime a slave may be a witness; that a free negro may not marry a white woman; that it is criminal to employ him, unless he has a certificate of registry; that he may not keep or carry arms, and is punishable for lifting his hand against a white man; and by the law incorporating the City of Washington, passed by this present Congress, a colored servant is made liable to be punished by stripes for a breach of the ordinances of the city.

It is not every person who is born in a State, and born free, that becomes a member of the political community. The Indians, born in the States, continue to be aliens; and so, I contend, do the free negroes, where the laws have not otherwise provided. A savage cannot be a member of a civilized community; he is incapable of exercising political rights; and nature seems to have made the negro a perpetual alien to the white man. Slaves are aliens. Alienage was the first foundation of slavery. Citizenship belongs to the civilized freeman. It is for Congress to provide a rule of naturalization that may admit to the rights of citizenship the civilized descendants of Indians and Africans. The States have no authority to admit citizens. When Congress have refused to naturalize any free negro, can it be tolerated that the master of a negro slave should have power to make him a citizen of the United States, entitled to all the privileges of citizens in the several States?

Who, then, are citizens of the United States? I would answer, 1st, those subjects of Great Britain who, being entitled to all the rights and privileges of British subjects, became American citizens by the Revolution; 2d, those who were declared citizens, or naturalized by the States, previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; 3d, European foreigners naturalized in conformity to the law of Congress; and I would add, 4th, the children born in the country of aliens, who were of a description that might have been naturalized. Since the adoption of the Federal Constitution, no State has had a right to naturalize an alien; and, therefore, I contend that no State can make citizens of its slaves; and that, if the father is incapable of naturalization, birth will not make the son a citizen.

The mass of mankind in this country may be divided into two classes—free people and slaves; but the class of free people includes many who are not citizens. The same mass may be divided into three classes—citizens, aliens, and denizens; the latter description of persons being those who are admitted to some portion of the rights and privileges of citizens, but not to all those rights and privileges. Such of the free negroes, in our country, as are not aliens, may be denizens, but none of them, it is apprehended, are citizens within the meaning of the clause of the Constitution of the United States which is under consideration. The free negro who would claim all the privileges and immunities of a citizen in another State, must show a right to all those privileges and immunities in his own.

I shall contend, sir, that a State possesses the right of excluding from settling within its limits even the citizens of another State.

Has not every county and parish a right to exclude paupers and vagrants? May not every city and town exclude persons having infectious diseases, although they are citizens? If New York may exclude the citizens of Philadelphia when the latter city is visited with yellow fever, and if New York may do the same under the like circumstance, what gives to them this right? The right of self-preservation confers this right of exclusion. And if a town possesses this right of exclusion, founded on the right of self-preservation, does not a State possess it? May Virginia send 40,000 free negroes to settle in the State of Ohio, and has the latter

State no power to exclude them? May Massachusetts or Pennsylvania send a few thousand of their citizens into Rhode Island and Delaware, there to exercise the privilege of suffrage, and thereby bring Rhode Island under the power of Massachusetts, or Delaware under the power of Pennsylvania? Some members may recollect that, not many years since, the citizens of Baltimore, of a certain political party, resolved to direct the elections of Annapolis, by hiring a number of men to go to Annapolis, there to remain six months, to qualify them to vote at elections. Might not the councils of a State be changed by the like means, if the State has no power to exclude intruders? Sir, every State has the right of self-preservation. If it is proved that a State has the right to exclude the leper from coming and settling therein, the construction contended for on the other side, that a State can exclude no citizen of another State, is overthrown. The health laws of every city and State refute the argument.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) asked, if it would not have excited the universal indignation of the House had Missouri excluded all the citizens of the United States from her territory. It would, doubtless. But it does not prove that she has no authority to exclude some persons dangerous to her peace and happiness, that it would have excited indignation had she excluded all the citizens of the United States. Even had that extreme case happened, it would not have been a good reason for rejecting the State. In such a case, it would be the proper course to admit the State, and decide on her pretensions; to say to her, "come under the canopy of the Constitution; come under our power; and then we will decide on the extent of your rights."

I will also put an extreme case. Suppose that the leprosy—a disease certainly communicated by the touch—should appear in Philadelphia, and that 10,000 persons should be affected before proper means had been taken to stop its progress; would the corporation of Philadelphia, or the Legislature of Pennsylvania, have a right to send those lepers into Delaware; and would they have a right of "settling" there, as one of the privileges of citizens of the United States, against the will of the government of Delaware? I think it will scarcely be contended that Delaware would not have a right to oppose an intrusion so fatal to her health; and, if she would have a right to oppose it, Missouri has an equal right to oppose the intrusion of free negroes dangerous to her peace.

Usage expounds the law. The States possess the right of exclusion; for they have exercised it, and Congress has sanctioned the right. In the act of the last session for incorporating the City of Washington, power is granted to the corporation "to enforce the departure of such vagrants and paupers as may come into the city to reside, unless they give ample security, and to prescribe the terms on which free negroes and mulattoes may reside in the city." All powers not granted to the General Government are retained by the States. Have the States granted to Congress their power to exclude dangerous persons from settling within their limits? I do not find that they have granted this power to Congress.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) said, that "citizens cannot enjoy the privileges and immunities of citizens in Missouri without settling there." The citizens who shall settle in Missouri will thereby become citizens of Missouri. The Constitution of the United States does not say that the citizens of one State shall have a right to become citizens of another State; but it speaks of them as continuing to be citizens of one State, yet entitled to privileges in another. A similar provision was contained in the Articles of Confederation, where it seems clear that nothing was intended but to confer privileges in passing through another State; egress and regress, the right to carry on commerce, exemption from the aliens' duty, &c.

The right of a State to close its doors against migration, is, I conceive, acknowledged by the Constitution to be in the States. [Here Mr. S. read part of section 9 of article 1.] A State possesses the right of banishing its own citizens; this has been common in ancient and modern times; and, if it may banish its own citizens, must it not have power to exclude others? The States, several of them, prescribed and banished the refugees; this banishment was sanctioned by Congress, who provided, in their naturalization laws, that those so banished should never return. The exclusion of free negroes from a white community is a politic and proper act; Congress do the same thing by their naturalization laws.

I shall contend that whatever be the just interpretation of the clause of the Constitution of the United States under consideration, it ought to be submitted for investigation and determination to the Judiciary. There are many parts of the Constitution which are addressed particularly to Congress; such are all those giving power to Congress, or to the Government of the United States, or to any department or officer thereof. There are other parts of the Constitution which are laws formed by the people, and addressed directly to the Judiciary. Those parts require no legislation by Congress; the Constitution being the supreme law. The clause under consideration is one of them; it vests no power in Congress; it calls for no legislation; it confers privileges and immunities on individuals; Congress cannot diminish or increase them; what are they the Judiciary should decide.

It might be material for Congress to inquire whether the constitution of a new State or an old State was republican or not. The Government is to guaranty to every State a republican form of government; and here, power being delegated to the Government, Congress may pass the necessary laws to carry it into effect. Should a State adopt a monarchical form of Government, I conceive Congress might pass a law repealing so much of their constitution as it was necessary to repeal, dictating a clause consistent with a republican form, which should remain in force only until the people themselves should form a republican constitution. It would not be necessary, even in that case, to put or keep a State out of the Union. It is to States "in this Union" that the clause applies. In a case of that kind a political question would arise, to be decided on by Congress. In this case there arises a legal question fit to be decided on by the judiciary. And if the judiciary are to decide on the laws of Massachusetts, Delaware and Virginia, whether the rights of free negroes are infringed or not, why should not they decide whether the rights of the same class of people will be infringed by the laws of Missouri? If we reject Missouri as a member of the Union, for this cause, we should, to be consistent, expel Massachusetts, Delaware, and Virginia.

The clause in the constitution of Missouri is not a law in itself, as is the clause of the Constitution of the United States to which it is said to stand opposed. It directs that a law shall be passed. I venture to predict, with confidence, that no law will be passed in pursuance of this direction, by the Legislature of Missouri, that will contravene the Constitution of the United States. The members of the Legislature of Missouri will be sworn to support the Constitution of the United States; they will not be sworn to support the constitution of Missouri, and they will know that their acts contrary to the Constitution of the United States, will be void. They will, therefore, give to the constitution of their State a construction consistent with the Constitution of the United States.

To make any defect in the form of a constitution an insuperable objection to the admission into the Union of a State that it is desirable to admit, would imply a want of power in this Government to correct the error. I would, by no means consider any repugnancy in the constitution of a State as an insuperable objection to the admission of such State. We might say to a Territory: "Form a State government; if it is not republican, we will cause it to be republican; if it is repugnant, we or the judiciary will correct it." The Federal Convention expected repugnances to be found in the Constitution of the United States, and have provided for them. It is declared in the Constitution, that "this Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in each State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."

Is it not better to decide some individual case upon full, calm, and deliberate investigation, before the judiciary, than to reject the resolution now before you, and thus outlaw a State? Shall we, by an ungracious and unnecessary act, produce a state of confusion, the result of which we cannot foresee? I hope not, as we do certainly know, that if there be in the constitution of Missouri a clause repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, that clause is null and void. If you had power to declare by law that any clause in the constitution of a State, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, was void, would you not at once pass an act repealing the offensive clause in the constitution of Missouri? You would, unquestionably. Now, so far as the clause objected to is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, the admission of Missouri will have the very same effect that your repealing act would have, had you power to pass it. If you had repealed the clause so far as it is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, the courts would compare the Constitutions, and declare that of Missouri void, so far as it was repugnant; and, if you admit the State, the courts will, in like manner, declare the constitution of Missouri, so far as it contravenes that of the United States, to be void and of no effect. Thus admission leads you to the very end which you profess to wish to attain. It makes void the clause objected to, so far as it is contrary to the Federal Constitution.

DECEMBER, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

All the constitutions of the States contained clauses repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; but the adoption thereof expunged them. Admission will have the same effect on the constitution of a new State that adoption had on those of the old. Then why not adopt the resolution before you, the effect of which will be, to expunge every repugnant clause from the constitution of Missouri?

The legislative and judicial powers of Government should be kept separate and distinct, so that the department exercising the one should not assume the duties of the other. Let us leave to the judiciary the exclusive exercise of their proper powers.

A construction should, if possible, be given to the constitution of Missouri, making it consistent with the Constitution of the United States.

If the literal construction of the constitution of Missouri was in opposition to the Constitution of the United States, yet, if we were satisfied that the convention intended the constitution which they framed to correspond with that of the United States, it should be so construed. [Here Mr. S. read several passages of law to show the rules of construction; that a thing within the letter is not within the statute, if contrary to the intention of the makers; that the word "all" admits of exceptions, &c.] The constitution of Missouri does not say all negroes and mulattoes shall be excluded; it does not say that negroes and mulattoes shall be excluded, being citizens of the United States. Suppose that the Legislature of Missouri should pass an act, in the very words of their constitution, that "free negroes and mulattoes shall not come to and settle in, this State, under any pretext whatever," and adds a proviso, that "this act shall not be construed to prevent the citizens of other States from being entitled to all privileges and immunities of this State, as secured to them by the Constitution of the United States." Would not such a law completely fulfil the intention of the constitution of Missouri, without contravening the Constitution of the United States? It would. Or should they pass a law such as that of Massachusetts, that a free negro, coming into the State, and remaining two months, may be seized and sent out of the State, unless by a certificate from the Secretary of State, he shall show that he is a citizen of the United States, it would fulfil the direction in their constitution, without contravening that of the United States.

The clause in question, of the constitution of Missouri, may have a very beneficial effect without operating contrary to the Constitution of the United States. It may operate on an extensive class of men, the emancipated blacks, and those of Africa and the West Indies, without violating, or being supposed to violate, the right of citizens of the United States. This clause makes it the duty of the Legislature of Missouri to pass a law to exclude free negroes and mulattoes; but it cannot become the duty of the Legislature, in carrying that provision of their constitution into effect, to violate the Constitution of the United States. They will construe their constitution in such a manner as to make it conform to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. They will presume that the convention did not intend to violate the Constitution of the United States, and they will pass no law that can have such an effect.

The fair and proper construction of the constitution of Missouri will be, to carry into effect the will of the people of that State, so far as it may be carried into effect consistently with the supreme law. The Legislature will exclude whom they may lawfully exclude. Doubtless, they may exclude those whom Congress will not naturalize. They will understand the people of their State as having said to them, "You shall pass such laws as constitutionally you may, to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from settling here."

I shall contend, sir, that Missouri in now a State of this Union. The Constitution says that, "New States may be admitted into this Union." This is the grant of power which Congress may exercise by bill or resolution; in either way the President is to concur. It is not necessary that Congress should twice admit a State into the Union. Has Congress once admitted Missouri? I contend that Congress has once admitted Missouri as a State of this Union, upon the single condition precedent, of forming a State Government; that having been done, Missouri became a State of this Union.

The act of the last session declares, that the inhabitants of the Missouri Territory are "authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government," and that "the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union." The people of Missouri have formed for themselves a State government, by electing a Governor and members of the Legislature; they have thus formed "the State," and the law declared that the State, when formed, should be admitted into the Union. The State has been formed some time past. When was it admitted? The answer is, "when formed." It may be said the act speaks of a future admission. The time of admission was future to the time of the passage of the act of the last session, but it is now past. Congress has decided, and the people of Missouri have decided. The compact is complete. When terms are offered by one party, and not only accepted, but executed by the other, the contract is confirmed, and it is too late for the party who offered the terms, to retract them.

Congress, then, have authorized the formation of a State, and admitted into the Union the State when formed. The State is formed, and consequently has become a member of the Union. The right of self-government is a natural inherent right of mankind. You have permitted the people of Missouri to assume the exercise of this right. The permission cannot be retracted. The right, once possessed, can never be surrendered. The moment Missouri ceased to be governed as a Territory, she became a State. The consequence of forming a State government is, to throw off the territorial government, to which the people never can return, or be subjected.

It has been said, (by Mr. SERGEANT,) that "you cannot make an independent State." I agree with the gentleman. You can authorize a territory to become a State; and in so doing it becomes a member of the Union. If Congress admit a territory to form a State, it is a territory no longer; and the same instant it becomes a State it becomes a member of the Union; for Congress have no authority to admit a State out of the Union.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) has said, that, if Missouri is a State, it is useless to pass the resolution. I admit that it is unnecessary to pass the resolution. The Senators and Representative from Missouri should have been permitted to take their seats. The resolution can be only useful to declare a fact of importance which has happened, to wit: that Missouri has become, since the last session of Congress, a State of this Union.

But it is said there is a proviso in the act of the last session, that the constitution of Missouri shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. True, there is such a proviso; but I deny that this makes either a condition precedent, or a condition the violation of which would forfeit the right of Missouri to be a State. The same proviso declares that the State shall not interfere with the disposal of the soil owned by the United States, and that no tax shall be imposed on lands the property of the United States. Are these conditions precedent? They are to continue through all time. This proviso is a declaration of the law, and a caution to Missouri; but such a proviso is not a condition precedent, nor a condition on violating which Missouri will forfeit her rights. [Here Mr. S. read from Woddeson's Lectures a passage to show that where one is made a denizen, with a proviso, that he shall demean himself in a certain manner, the violation of the proviso does not forfeit his right to be a denizen; but he will be punished according to his fault.] This, said Mr. S. is a case in point. Such a proviso is no more than a warning and declaration of the law. The proviso in the act of the last session was a caution to Missouri that her constitution should be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

All the new States formed of the territories of the United States have been admitted from the time of their forming State governments. Can we receive Senators and a Representative elected by a territory? If Illinois was not a State previous to the last session, when the last declaration was made respecting her admission, her Senators and Representatives have no right to seats in this body. The Senators were not elected by the Legislature of a State, or her Representatives by the people of a State. But we have admitted them, and so affirmed that they were elected by a State; therefore Illinois was a State before the last session, when the second declaration of her admission was made; and, the circumstances being the same, Missouri is now a State of this Union.

The proviso in the act of the last session that the constitution of Missouri should not be repugnant to that of the United States, is inoperative, useless, surplusage. We might as well have enacted that the stars shall not obscure the sun to-morrow as have enacted that the constitution of Missouri shall not be repugnant to that of the United States. No such repugnance can have any effect. It is, ipso facto, void. The Constitution of the United States has said that nothing repugnant to it in the constitution or laws of any State should stand; and why should we prescribe a rule already prescribed and declared supreme by the people?

It has been admitted that there may be cases where the constitution of a State will so contravene the Constitution of the United States that it may be proper for Congress to interfere. I also agree that such cases may arise; but those must be cases requiring legislation from Congress. Should a State provide for a different representation than is allowed her by the Constitution of the United States, it might be proper for Congress to pass a law respecting the times, places, and manner, of holding elections for Senators and Representatives in such State. In other cases, Congress might find it necessary to pass laws to carry into execution the power of the Government to guaranty to a State a republican form of government. Can any case be supposed in which it would be proper to expel a State? I cannot imagine any such case. The Constitution does not say that Congress shall guaranty to every State in the Union a constitution not repugnant to that of the United States. It says, that the Constitution shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution of any State to the contrary notwithstanding. When we know that our Constitution is supreme, that any thing repugnant to it in the constitution and laws of Missouri is null and void, shall we proceed as if the Constitution of the United States would be endangered by the admission of Missouri? I hope not, sir.

After a new State has formed a constitution, Congress have just the same power over it, that they possess over the new constitution formed by an old State. Why should we examine, with microscopic eye, the constitutions of Illinois and Missouri, and never ask that the constitution of Connecticut should be laid before us?

The consequences which may follow the rejection of the resolution, are worthy of the consideration of statesmen, who have, or ought to have left every passion behind them at the threshold, and whose object is the peace, welfare, and happiness of the community.

We affect to fear that some hundred negroes

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

may lose their Constitutional right to settle as citizens in Missouri; and, under this pretence, we are about to disfranchise a State, dissolve the connexion between her and the Union, and produce difficulties, the consequences of which we cannot foresee; when we do know that no citizen of the United States can be deprived by the Legislature of Missouri of the rights to which he is entitled under the Constitution of the United States.

Sir, the States retain all power not delegated to the United States. They have not delegated power on this subject. It seems to be admitted in the Constitution that they retain it. They may admit the migration of such persons as they please until a certain time. Does it not follow that they may reject the migration of such persons as they please at all times? Let every member friendly to the rights of States beware how he sanctions an opinion, that all the barriers between the States are entirely broken down, and that the States cannot exclude persons dangerous to their health, their happiness, or their peace.

In every difficulty we should ask ourselves, what is now best to be done? Shall we send home the Senators and Representative of Missouri? What is then to follow? We ought to know what is next to be done; for the consequences ought to be maturely weighed in deciding this political question. The rejection of the representation of a State is a measure which threatens to derange the political machine. Shall Missouri be independent? Shall we bring her back to a territorial situation? Shall her laws, passed by her State Legislature, become void? It has been suggested that we may pass an act to confirm them? That I deny. We have nothing to do with the laws of the State of Missouri. Consider well the consequences of rejecting the resolution. I speak not of commotions; but I ask you to consider the effects of the doubt you will throw over the validity of their laws, and the authority of their Government; of the litigation which your decision may produce, by occasioning a belief that their acts are void. Let us adopt the resolution, which will secure every right, and preserve order and harmony.

When Mr. S. had concluded—

Mr. STRONG, of New York, said, the magnitude and importance of the subject under consideration must be his apology for claiming a small share of the attention and patience of honorable members, while he submitted the reasons for the vote he was about to give. I shall endeavor, said he, to be brief and plain in what I have to say.

The people of the Territory of Missouri were, by a law of Congress, authorized to form "a constitution and State government, provided that the same, whenever formed, should be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States." They have formed a constitution, presented it for the approbation of Congress, and asked admission into the Union. If it violates the plain provisions of the Federal Constitution, ought it not to be disapproved, and the resolution under consideration be rejected? The constitution of Missouri contains, among other things, this remarkable clause—"It shall be the duty of the Legislature to pass laws to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, the State, under any pretext whatsoever." Here permit me to remark that the authority is express and positive, and is in restraint of personal liberty, and of the means of contesting personal rights. But are the persons here described citizens of the United States, or of a State; or of both; or of neither? If citizens, then the repugnancy is plain and palpable. But the honorable member (Mr. SMYTH, of Virginia,) on my right, who has just resumed his seat, has attempted, ingeniously, to prove, that free negroes and mulattoes are either aliens or denizens, and consequently, not citizens.

The honorable gentleman will pardon me for differing from him. I cannot assent to the proposition that this description of persons are aliens. An alien is one who owes allegiance to some Government other than that under which he lives. Allegiance to a foreign Power enters into the very essence of the term alien. To what foreign Power, or to what Government, other than that of the United States, do these persons owe allegiance? If to none—then what are they, if not citizens? But, if they are not aliens, it is insisted they are denizens. Is it so? No one can be a denizen who has not been an alien. Denization is the modification of alienage. But Congress can pass laws of naturalization only, and not of denization. It would seem to follow, therefore, that these persons cannot be denizens.

He has argued, too, at some length, to prove that a State possesses the right, not only of banishing her citizens, but excluding from her limits paupers, lepers, and persons infected with pestilential diseases; and hence inferred that each State might exclude all the citizens of the other States; and, consequently, that Missouri had a right to prohibit free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, Missouri.

I have never understood that a State, town, or city, could prevent the admission of a pauper as such. In many of the States, and I do not know but in all of them, a pauper may be removed if likely to become a public charge; and every person, whether pauper or prince, may be prevented from gaining what the lawyers call a legal settlement.

That a State may banish for crime, and guard herself against pestilence, need not be denied. The rights and privileges of peaceable, unoffending citizens, for whom we are expounding the law, do not depend upon the principles which determine the disabilities and punishment of criminals. Because a State can banish a traitor, does it follow that she can deport every or any harmless, unsuspected citizen? Because Pennsylvania may exclude from the city of Philadelphia persons infected with the leprosy or the plague, can she, therefore, exclude all the officers and troops of the Federal Government?—or any uninfected, peaceable citizen of any State or place? If not, Missouri remains undefended. She must seek some other mode of justifying the exceptionable provisions of her constitution.

It is, moreover, contended by the honorable gentleman, (Mr. SMYTH,) that Missouri became a member of this Union in fact, and in right, on the 19th of July last, the day on which the constitution was formed; and I understood him to say that, if the constitution of Missouri, now before us, had contained the provisions of a monarchical, instead of a republican form of government, Congress, by an act of legislation, could change it and make it republican. I cannot agree that Missouri is a member of this Union; or that Congress, by the silent operation of a law, could remedy the supposed evil. These shall be subjects for future consideration. But, does not the honorable gentleman in this, concede to Congress the right of making a constitution for a State, whether such State be out of, or in the Union? This is a broad concession, and yielding more than I am willing to take; whatever may be the powers of Congress in supervising the formation of State government, I have no hesitation in saying, that I think gentlemen will go with me, that when a State is in the Union, and one of the United States, her constitution and laws are beyond the inspection, or revision, or control of Congress. They must be referred for adjudication and correction to other tribunals.

The general proposition has been urged by the honorable member, (Mr. SMYTH,) that, if any clause in the constitution of Missouri be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land, such clause is utterly null and void. This is true in law, not in fact. But, shall we sanction a wrong, which, until remedied, we know will produce injustice and evil? This constitution is submitted to us. For what purpose, unless it be for our approbation? If this submission and approbation are necessary, can it acquire the force and effect of a law, until Congress has approved it? But if approved and put into operation, when, by whom, and how are its repugnant provisions to be adjudged null and void? I think one must have some skill in the cultivation of chances to determine. This proposition proves too much. It proves that every law or other matter, which requires the revision and sanction of Congress to give it validity, may be passed with impunity, our oaths to the contrary notwithstanding, however flagrantly it may impugn the Constitution of the United States.

The question whether, if the resolution under consideration be rejected, Missouri will remain a sovereign independent State, or return to her territorial condition? has been so fully and ably examined, by my honorable friend, the member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) and my colleague, (Mr. STORRS,) that I shall not trespass upon your patience with any further discussion of it. And the more especially, since the honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. SMYTH,) has admitted, that Missouri cannot be a sovereign State, and independent of the United States. If she cannot, and if she be not now in full union and communion with the sister States, it seems to follow that her condition is territorial.

But it has been earnestly contended, that Missouri is now a member of this Union—one of the United States. This view of the subject has been pressed upon our attention with much feeling and eloquence, by the honorable chairman of the committee, (Mr. LOWNDES,) who reported the resolution, as well as by the honorable members (Messrs. BARBOUR and SMYTH,) from Virginia. And is Missouri a component part of the Union? Is she one of the United States? Do not the submission of her constitution to Congress, its reference to a committee of this House, the report of that committee, and the resolution we are now discussing, all admit that she is not? But if in truth she be a member of the Federal family, why is her constitution on our desks? We have no business with it. The time has gone by. Congress has no more right to approve or condemn it, than it has the constitution of Maine or Virginia.

When did Missouri become a member of this Union? It is said, from the time she formed her constitution. I shall not enter into a verbal criticism upon the language of the law which authorized her to form a constitution. A more interesting question presents itself. It is this: can Congress admit a State (to be formed from its territory) into this Union, prospectively? As for instance, suppose Congress, in the law authorizing the people of Missouri to form a constitution, had enacted that, on the 19th of July, 1820, the State of Missouri will have become a member of this Union, and from and after that day she is hereby declared to be one of the United States. The question is not so much what Congress has done, as what Congress has a right to do. The powers of Congress, although sovereign, are limited. These powers cannot be exceeded. A portion of this sovereignty may be delegated to the people of Missouri. But not unqualifiedly, as to the form and manner of its execution. Because, if unqualifiedly, they might extort the sanction of Congress to a form of government which notoriously violated the Constitution of the United States. This will be more distinctly seen by examining the necessary powers and requisites in the admission of new States, and the obligation of the nation towards them when admitted. The Federal Constitution provides, "that new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union;" and that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." There must be a State formed, or to be formed. If from the territory of the United States, as was the case of Missouri, it is to be formed, and this formation can only be by the permission and authority of Congress. As Congress cannot rightfully execute a given power, so as to violate the Constitution of the United States, it would appear to follow that the same power could not be rightfully executed by any other body of men so as to conflict with the provisions of the Federal Constitution. But every State, howsoever formed, when admitted, must have a republican form of government. Is it not necessary that we should have the means of judging of this form? Yet how can we judge, in our legislative capacity, unless the instrument be submitted to us? And if submitted, it must be done before the State becomes a member of the Union. Suppose, then, that Missouri had in fact become one of the United States in July last, and that you now discovered that her constitution, instead of containing provisions for a Governor and Senators to be elected by the people, bore on its frontispiece a crown and sceptre, and contained provisions for a King and an hereditary Senate? This is a possible case. It is one of the cases provided for by the Constitution. For the United States, the faith, honor, and strength of the nation are pledged to guaranty a republican form of government. What could you do? Shake hands with royalty? This would be anti-republican. Would you remit it to the Judiciary? The Judiciary could afford no relief. What then? Legislate it right? This would be constitution-making. No, sir, your parchment would not do. Force must be applied, and the decision left to the sword. If this possible state of things may happen, although it may not disprove the power of Congress to admit a State prospectively, yet does it not utterly discountenance the policy, and go very far to deny the right of prospective admission?

In speaking of a resort to the sword, I beg to be understood as referring exclusively to the supposed case. I do not mean to intimate that serious consequences are to follow the rejection of this resolution. I have no such apprehensions. If I had, still I would preserve inviolate the Federal Constitution as my only political hope.

But the constitution of Missouri is before us, and, in my judgment, properly; for I cannot bring myself to believe that Missouri is now one of the United States. She could not be one without the assent of Congress. I cannot learn that this assent has ever been given; or, indeed, that it could have been given, consistently with the principles and safety of the Federal Constitution. Is it proper for us, then, and are we bound, to examine the constitution thus presented to us, and to determine whether it be, or be not, repugnant to the Constitution of the United States? I think this matter is cognizable by us, because we are sworn to support the Federal Constitution. What more effectual or permanent support can we give than to take care that no person, high or low, shall be deprived of a single privilege or immunity which this Constitution secures to him? If, then, the Missouri constitution, sanctioned by us, should, intermediate the time of its going into operation and the decision of the Federal courts upon it, deprive any citizen, or other person, of his Federal rights, or privileges, or immunities, would it not be in consequence of our sanction? For, without that, could it have any operation? The right to determine does not depend upon the degree of repugnancy, or upon the extent and magnitude of the injury which may be produced, but upon the question, is it repugnant, and will it injure and oppress the citizen in its operation? Some cases of palpable and flagrant repugnancy have been mentioned. I will not trouble the House with the repetition of them in this place, particularly as my honorable friend (Mr. Lowndes) from South Carolina has, in the liberality of his mind, justly conceded that there might be cases in which it would become the duty of Congress to reject a constitution; and he supposed the case of Senators and Representatives to Congress, whose term of service should be different from that prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. This concession was necessary in the supposed case, because it would manifestly impugn the powers and privileges of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Judiciary could afford no relief.

I am entirely opposed, sir, to remitting this matter to the Judiciary. Why send it to the Judiciary for adjudication? It may be years or ages before it reaches that tribunal. In the meantime, hundreds of American citizens may be deprived of their rights, oppressed, and persecuted. Who is to take their part? It requires money and friends to regain lost rights. Many sound objections have been urged by those who have preceded me against this inference. I shall content myself with stating one further objection. It is this: A free negro or mulatto of the District of Columbia may take and hold real estate in Missouri. This, I think, will not be denied; and, to make the case the stronger, suppose he derives the title to his land directly from the United States. Now, by the constitution of Missouri, he is not only excluded from the possession of his land, but is prevented from coming into the State and contesting his claims in the courts there, and the doors of the Federal courts are barred against him. They cannot entertain his claim and afford him relief, because he is not a citizen of a State. How is this to be answered? Or is the sufferer to be turned off remediless? And will you thus permit individual wrong to accumulate? Or will you rather prevent it, by staying the operation of the only cause which can produce it?

Are our free negroes and mulattoes citizens? This is a deeply interesting question, both as it respects them and the nation. The report of the committee seems to admit that some of them are citizens, because it says that a large class of them "cannot be considered as citizens of any State." The honorable members (Messrs. BARBOUR and SMYTH) from Virginia deny that they are citizens. But the gentleman (Mr. BARBOUR) from Virginia who first spoke, will permit me to say, that I think his definition of a citizen proves too much; for it proves that the Jews of Maryland are not citizens of Maryland, although their fathers and their ancestors have resided there since the days of Lord Baltimore. A definition may destroy a right, but never can create a right. Facts and experience in politics and morals are better than definitions. What, therefore, are some of the peculiar and distinctive characteristics of a citizen of a State? They are, the right of passing, freely and unmoled, from town to town, and place to place, within the State, and the right of residing, at pleasure, in any part of the same. That these rights belong to every one entitled to the high privilege of citizen, I think will not be denied.

But these rights are also common to all free persons, of every age and sex, within the State, except aliens, lunatics, vagabonds, and criminals; because their possession and exercise are indispensably necessary to the social relations of life, and to the preservation of the State. Indeed, vastly the greatest proportion of the citizens of a State have no other external mark of their citizenship. Females and minors cannot be elected to office, or vote, or sit on juries, or be subjected to taxes, as a general rule. These persons enjoy the privilege of citizenship, and the immunity of the laws of the State, to which they must demean themselves, as completely as the man who has, in addition, the qualification of a voter, or a juryman. What, then, is the meaning of that great clause in the Federal Constitution, which declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?" This has been called the basis of the Union. As I understand this clause, it does away the disability of alienism. Without it, the citizens of each State would be aliens to every other State, and could not, of right, enter another State without a passport. It confers the same common privileges and immunities upon the citizens of Maryland, for instance, in reference to the United States, as the citizens of Maryland possess in reference to that State. Hence, a citizen of Maryland may pass into and about the State of Virginia, and reside there, subjecting himself to the laws of Virginia, as he was bound to do to the laws of Maryland; because in Maryland he possessed these rights, and owed this obedience. But it does not follow, nor is it at all necessary that because he was a voter or a juryman in Maryland, he must be either the one or the other in Virginia. If this reasoning be correct, then these essential rights of citizenship are secured, and each State left in full possession of its obligation and powers to protect its peaceable citizens and defend itself against violence and crime.

From what has been said, I think it may be fairly concluded that free negroes and mulattoes are citizens, unless some positive act of disfranchisement can be shown. But I beg leave, sir, to examine this matter in another point of view. I am constrained to believe that these persons are citizens of the United States, and, as such, have a right peaceably to pass through, or reside in, any part of the United States.

The Federal Constitution, so far as I can understand it, recognises and knows but two descriptions of freemen, for the question under discussion concerns freemen only, and I shall avoid, if possible, any mention of the other class of persons. These descriptions are citizens and aliens. I shall not go into an examination of the laws or practice of ancient or modern nations to ascertain the national character of their inhabitants. Their constitutions are unlike ours, and if in ours there be any other designation of the national character of freemen than that of citizens or aliens, what is it? I have said that Congress only could naturalize aliens—that is, persons who owe allegiance to a foreign Government. But a slave has no country, and owes no allegiance, except to his master. How, then, is he an alien? If restored to his liberty, and made a freeman, what is his national character? It must be determined by the Federal Constitution, and without reference to policy; for it respects personal liberty. Is it not that of citizen or alien? But it has been shown that he is not an alien. May we not, therefore, conclude, nay, are we not bound to conclude, that he is a citizen of the United States? Now, permit me to say that it is one of the inestimable privileges of a citizen of the United States to pass, unmolested, through the several States, and to reside where it may best suit his health and convenience. Indeed, sir, this is the essential feature in the federal character of an American citizen. If, therefore, free negroes and mulattoes are citizens of the United States, does not the constitution of Missouri conflict with the Federal Constitution, although they may not be citizens of a State? But some of them, at least, are citizens of a State.

Facts are better than theories. In many of the States they are recognised as citizens, and, among other things, are eligible to office, entitled to hold real estate, to vote, to sue and be sued. In some of the States, their fathers, with ours, fought the battles of the Revolution. Vermont was not one of the original thirteen States; she was admitted into the Union in 1791, and had then, and still has, free negroes and mulattoes, whose citizenship, by the citizens of that State, I believe, has never been doubted or denied. These are facts within the knowledge of honorable gentlemen who hear me. But I beg leave, sir, to refer to the case of Louisiana. By the third article of the treaty which ceded to the United States the territory of Louisiana, it is stipulated that "the inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be admitted, &c., to all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States." The term inhabitants is used. It is a comprehensive term; and whether it includes slaves, is not necessary for me to inquire. It clearly includes freemen, and consequently free negroes and mulattoes, unless excepted. And, if excepted, permit me to say it belongs to gentlemen opposed to me to show where and how they are excepted. The State of Louisiana was formed from a part of the ceded territory, and admitted into the Union; and are not the free negroes and mulattoes in that State citizens of Louisiana? They were made citizens of the United States by the treaty; and, in my judgment, they became citizens of the State when the State became a member of this Union.

As connected with the question, who is a citizen of a State? I will refer again to the Federal Constitution. It is there declared that the judicial power shall extend (among other cases) to controversies "between citizens of different States." Now, any person in the State of Maryland, who can prosecute a citizen of Virginia, under this clause, must be a citizen of Maryland; and so of every other State. Is not this a sure criterion of citizenship? Who, then, can prosecute? Is there a freeman in the nation, not an alien, and domiciled in a State, who cannot prosecute and be prosecuted in the Federal courts? If there be one, it must be owing to some legal disability. Are free negroes and mulattoes, domiciled in a State, under any disability? The Federal Constitution interposes none; and I know of no law or judicia decision which does. The fair presumption is, that they have the right to prosecute; and it devolves upon those who deny the right, to prove the disability. But, if they can prosecute in the Federal courts, under this clause in the Federal Constitution; then they are citizens of the States, and the constitution of Missouri is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, because it acts directly upon the citizen, and does not add to, but takes away, his existing rights and privileges.

DECEMBER, 1820.

But, assuming that there are free negroes and mulattoes who are not citizens of any State, it is said by my friend (Mr. LOWNDES) from South Carolina, that the exceptionable clause in the constitution of Missouri is to be so construed as to apply to them only. The power given to the Legislature is mandatory; the language of the clause is general, and, in terms, applies to all, and may be executed upon all, free negroes and mulattoes. I cannot assent to that exposition of a power which would establish one rule in Maine and another in Missouri. No, sir, this is Constitutional law, and does not speak a language official, and a language confidential. It means what it says; and should be construed as it reads. How do you expound other similar Constitutional powers? Take the treaty-making power, for example. Will you say that you have a right to make a treaty with England, but that you have no right to make a treaty with President Boyer—with the Republic of Hayti? Take also the power to naturalize. Does it include the subjects of England and France, and exclude those of Persia and China? How, then, under a positive grant of power to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming into a State, will you admit some and exclude others?

I must solicit your indulgence, sir, for a few minutes more, while I examine this subject in reference to existing treaties, and the laws of Congress. These treaties and laws, if made pursuant to the Constitution of the United States, are the supreme law of the land. Does not the constitution of Missouri plainly violate the provisions and stipulations of existing treaties? I have already had occasion to refer, for another purpose, to the third article of the treaty for the cession of Louisiana to the United States. Has the time gone by when the stipulation in that article is no longer binding? How are the free negroes and mulattoes in the territory of Arkansas to be excluded from the State of Missouri? Does Missouri possess the power of disfranchising a citizen of the United States—of destroying the federal rights of an American citizen? If not, are we at liberty to sanction an instrument, the operation of which, until arrested by the tardy arm of the law, will impair and may destroy these federal rights? But this, sir, is not all. By the existing treaty between the United States and Great Britain, it is stipulated that “the inhabitants of the two countries respectively shall have liberty freely and securely to come, &c., and to remain and reside in any parts of the said territories respectively.” The substance of this provision is found in the treaty between us and Sweden; and I believe in nearly all the commercial treaties which we have made with the nations of Europe. Indeed, sir, provisions of this sort are essential to the successful operations of commerce, and to the preservation of our commercial relations. The Missouri constitution infracts this provision in the treaty, by excluding from her limits the free negroes and mulattoes of the Canadas and of the other British possessions, who may wish to go and reside in the State of Missouri for commercial purposes. It does more: the principle of it strikes at the root of the commercial relations between the several States, and between the United States and foreign nations.

Once more, and I have done. Congress has passed laws, offering bounties in land, to induce persons to enter into the Army of the United States. They have entered, done their duty, and received a title to their land; among them are many free negroes and mulattoes. Suppose they are not citizens of a State. Missouri says they shall not enjoy the bounty of their Government. Nay, more, they shall not have the humble privilege of contesting their rights in her courts of justice. Did not the Federal Government, in giving the title, pledge its faith and honor to secure the possession and the enjoyment? I humbly conceive it did; and that these, as well as the proudest American citizens, are eminently entitled to our protection, for they have endured war and peril, have wasted their strength, and shed their blood, in fighting the battles of their country.

When Mr. STRONG had concluded—

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, moved that the resolution be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question being taken thereon, it was determined in the negative—yeas 73, nays 90, as follows:

The question was then stated, shall the resolution be engrossed, and read a third time? And debate arising thereon, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, December 11.

A new member, to wit, from the State of Maine, late a part of the State of Massachusetts, JOSEPH DANE, elected to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of John Holmes, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

JOHN A. CUTHBERT, from the State of Georgia, also appeared and took his seat.

Mr. SERGEANT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, delivered the following report:

The Committee on the Judiciary to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Arkansas, complaining of the delay and denial of justice from the neglect and non-attendance of the judges appointed for that Territory, report—

That, if the cause of complaint still continued, it would certainly call for the interposition of this House to endeavor to remove it. But, upon inquiry at the Department of State, the committee have had the satisfaction to learn that the two judges of whom the complaint was made, have resigned, and others have been appointed to their place, who it is hoped and believed will feel a just sense of the duty that belongs to their station, and perform it accordingly. If, in this respect, there should again be a failure, it will then be necessary to consider of the propriety of some act which will not only mark it with decisive reprobation, but have a tendency to prevent its recurrence. They, therefore, offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

And the same was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS made a report on the petition of Rosalie P. Deslonde, accompanied with a bill for her relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, the Secretary of State was required to communicate to this House any information which may have been received by that department, touching any alterations in the commercial laws or regulations of any of the nations of Europe, which may have been made or adopted since the year 1817.

On motion of Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for prohibiting printers and editors of newspapers, and all other persons who are proprietors of any such printing establishment, or in any way concerned in the publication of newspapers, from being mail contractors or postmasters, and also prohibiting postmasters from being mail contractors, or being employed in the conveyance of the mail.

On motion of Mr. JACKSON, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the eleventh section of the act, entitled "An act for regulating processes in the courts of the United States, and providing compensations for the officers of the said courts and for jurors and witnesses," providing for the removal of suits and actions in certain cases.

Mr. WHITMAN submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table for one day:

Resolved, That the 16th rule, in relation to the "order of business of the day," be so far altered, that the Speaker, in calling for petitions, shall hereafter begin by calling for petitions from Maine.

THE DEFENCE OF BALTIMORE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of sundry merchants of Baltimore, for compensation for vessels sunk in the harbor of that city, to prevent the approach of the British shipping in the Fall of the year 1814, accompanied with a bill for their relief; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That, in the month of September, 1814, sundry vessels belonging to the memorialists were taken by public authority, and sunk at the mouth of the harbor of Baltimore, to prevent the vessels of the enemy from entering that harbor.

On the 7th March, 1815, the Secretary of War wrote to Colonel Paul Bentalou, quartermaster general at Baltimore, as follows: "As the owners of the vessels which were sunk at Baltimore will now become very importunate, and as you probably cannot raise them fast enough to meet their wishes and expectations, you may, therefore, permit individuals to raise their own vessels for a stipulated sum, or in such other manner as may, in your opinion, be compatible with the public interest, as it is my wish that you should give every facility to the raising of those vessels which may be consistent with economy and the public interest. As there no doubt will be many applications to Congress by individuals owning those vessels for compensation for damages, by injuries either to their vessels or rigging, while sunk, it would be advisable that such damages should be duly ascertained, in such manner as you may think best, at the time the vessels are respectively raised, and a report thereof made to this office."

In pursuance of these instructions, three respectable citizens of Baltimore, one an "experienced" ship-carpenter, one a ship-joiner, and the other a ship-chandler, were appointed to survey the said vessels, and appraise the damages; and, in the month of September following, a return of the amount assessed upon each vessel was made to the Secretary of War; and, in April, 1816, an appropriation was made to the amount of the several sums thus assessed, which was subsequently distributed among the claimants.

On the 7th of January, 1817, the owners of the vessels presented their memorial to Congress, claiming a further allowance, alleging that the sum previously awarded them was "not sufficient to pay one-fourth the expense of repairing," and that the appraisement of damages had been made without "their knowledge or concurrence." Upon this memorial there has been no decision by Congress; and, on the 15th of February last, James H. Causten, one of the memorialists, urged his claim anew upon the consideration of Congress in a separate memorial, and, to the reasons previously assigned why further compensation should be made, has subjoined a claim for a per diem allowance from the time his vessel was sunk till the repairs were completed, which he alleges to have been two hundred and ninety-four days. He also alleges that the vessel was in good repair when sunk; that the repairs, after it was raised, cost $3,589 03; and that irreparable injury was done by sinking, to the amount of $1,000, which, with $5 per day for demurrage, makes an aggregate of $6,059 03; and deducting therefrom $675, the amount awarded him by the appraisers, he claims a balance from the Government of $5,384 03, $384 more than his witnesses prove his vessel to have been worth before it was sunk.

Equal and exact justice may not have been done by the surveyors who appraised the damages; but it is difficult to perceive what measures could now be adopted that would be more likely to effect the object. The survey and appraisement was made by three of the citizens of Baltimore, of acknowledged skill and respectability, who appear to have commenced their labors on the 26th of March, 1815, and to have concluded them on the 15th of August of the same year; and the minuteness of their survey, (of which their records furnish proof,) together with the time their attention must have been drawn to the subject, forbid the presumption that the business of their appointment could have been lightly passed over. And were it even admitted that they could have been influenced by partial considerations, it would seem at least probable that their partialities must have inclined them to the side of their fellow-citizens rather than to that of the Government. It is believed, then, that it would be inexpedient to authorize an additional allowance for damages.

The committee are, however, of the opinion that, so far as relates to demurrage, the memorialists are entitled to relief, although, until the last session, no claim of that character appears to have been urged upon the attention of Congress. Two of the surveyors have certified (and the fact is also established by their records) that they made no allowance "for the deterioration of the vessels;" and it is equally true that none was made for the detention from their owners.

As it is impracticable to ascertain what income, if any, would have been derived from the use of the vessels antecedent to the close of the war, had they not been sunk, it is believed as substantial justice as is practicable in the case will have been done should a reasonable daily allowance be made, from the close of the war to the end of a necessary period, for repairing the injuries; and for this purpose the committee report a bill.

[The following documents were subsequently communicated to the House of Representatives.]

CAPITOL, February 19, 1820.

SIR: A memorial from certain merchants of Baltimore (claiming compensation for injury sustained by their vessels which had been sunk by legal authority for the preservation of that city) has been submitted to the Committee of Claims, over which you preside. I had given, prior to your last report, a verbal statement to you. The report and memorial having been recommended, it may be proper to give to your committee a detailed statement in writing.

In the year 1812 I commanded in Baltimore. The enemy appeared off the mouth of the river, and threatened the city. To prevent an attempt to pass the fort, I caused a number of vessels to be moored, head to stern, from the fort to the opposite point, prepared for sinking. The enemy did not attack during that year, and the vessels were returned to their owners. The expense of repairing the injury sustained by their exposure to the weather was paid by the city. This occurrence called my attention to the subject, and I submitted a bill (in Senate) which was signed on July 16, 1813, entitled "An act providing for the further defence of the ports and harbors of the United States," which authorized the sinking of hulks or vessels as impediments to the entrance of the ships of the enemy into the ports of the United States, and appropriated the sum of $250,000 to defray any expense that might occur in consequence.

Subsequent to the attack on Washington, I was again called into the service of the United States, as commander at Baltimore, and made a requisition on the city for vessels to be sunk; a sufficient number were delivered to Commodore Rodgers, (then acting with a body of seamen in concert with me,) and sunk under his direction.

The enemy attacked by land and water, and having completely failed in both, they evacuated the Chesapeake; and, being superseded in my command, I took my seat in the Senate. Aware of the injury the sunken vessels would sustain, I requested the Secretary of War, Colonel Monroe, to direct Commodore Barney, who had a number of seamen under his command, to cause the vessels to be raised, and an order was sent to that effect, but was not executed. The commodore alleged that his men had not been paid, and had not clothing sufficient for such work. I then requested the Secretary to direct the quartermaster general, Colonel Bentalou, to cause the vessels to be raised. The Winter had set in; few were raised; and most of the vessels remained all Winter and late in the Spring under water, and must have sustained great injury. I also recommended to the Secretary of War the propriety of appointing appraisers to value and assess the damage each vessel had sustained. That course was pursued; the ships were all raised, and delivered to their respective owners. Three respectable men were appointed by the quartermaster general as appraisers, to wit, an experienced ship-master, a ship-carpenter, and a ship-chandler; they visited each vessel, and appraised the damage or injury that was apparent.

It has been alleged that most of the owners knew not of the appraisement having been made; that the masters were not on board when made; and that the appraisers were not apprized of the real injury sustained by the destruction of the sails and rigging on board of the vessels when sunk, all which must have been completely destroyed by their long immersion. Such was the case (as I have been told) of the brig or schooner Sally, belonging to J. H. Causten. The damage sustained by that vessel was valued at $676. Nor was it possible for the appraisers, by a visit of a few hours, to ascertain the real damages that had been sustained; they could only be known by an attendance on each vessel while their repairs were making. I had two vessels sunk, and was allowed for damages sustained by the Adriana $300, which sum scarcely paid for cleaning and drying the ship. The principal injury she sustained was not discovered; she foundered at sea during her first voyage, yet she had been carefully examined. I am within the amount when I state that three times the sum allowed did not place her in the same state in which she was at the time she was sunk. My vessels were raised by the owners before the ice closed the river, and must have suffered less than others.

The vessels were kept from their owners generally from six to eight months, and I believe, some were longer under water; for which no allowance whatever was made, as appears by the certificate of the appraisers, and for which they have a fair and undoubted claim. This detention was the fault of the Government, for, with proper exertion, the vessels might all have been raised before the ice covered the river.

The detention of those vessels for so many months was a most serious injury to the claimants. The time they were detained would have enabled the owners to have made at least one voyage to Europe, and two or three to the West Indies; and there is no reason whatever, that I can conceive, to prevent the committee from reporting a bill allowing the owners a fair demurrage or per diem allowance for the time the vessels were detained. A similar allowance was made to the owners of scows used to make a floating bridge, by the act of 27th April, 1816; under which law the owners received one dollar per day for every day the scows were so employed, amounting to $2,500 for the use of twenty-four scows; whilst the owners of ships sunk are allowed only $15,188 for the great injury sustained, and for a long detention of their vessels. Can this be right or just?

Soon after Congress met, in the session of 1815 and 1816, I applied to the Secretary of War for the valuation of the damages assessed for the vessels that were sunk, and to know whether he was prepared to pay the amount to the respective owners. He put into my hand the list, (a copy of which you have,) and observed that the valuation appeared to be very low, but that he was unable to pay even that sum, the whole amount of $250,000 appropriated for that object having been applied to other items of expenditure, by order of the President. In consequence, I submitted the subject to the Senate, and an appropriation was made, on the 20th of April, 1816, to cover the valuation, in the words following, to wit: "For the payment of damages sustained by the ships and vessels sunk at the entrance of the port of Baltimore, to prevent the ships of the enemy from passing the fort and entering the harbor, $15,188 50."

You will observe that the appropriation is for damages only; no allowance made for detention, as appears by the certificate of the appraisers, nor was any directed to be made by the Secretary of War, as appears by a copy of his order herewith, dated the 7th of March, 1816. He only directs the appraisement of the damages actually sustained. The necessity of directing the attention of the appraisers to that object had not occurred to the Secretary. The act of 1813, however, contemplated such allowance; for it says emphatically, "that the President be authorized to hire or purchase hulks, or other means of impediment to the entrance of the ships of the enemy, to be sunk." Now, sir, the claimants demand payment for the hire of their vessels; and I believe there is no instance of wagons impressed, as those ships were, [being debarred,] from receiving pay for their hire for the time they were detained. The claim, I repeat, is equitable; it is just; and has, I believe, been refused in no instance where vessels, horses, or wagons, have been taken and employed in public service.

I am, sir, with respect, yours, &c.

S. SMITH.

HON. LEWIS WILLIAMS,
Chairman of Committee of Claims.

MISSOURI.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. ARCHER, of Virginia, said, that, having had some share in protracting the trial, to which the patience of the House was to be subjected, in the debate, he owed it the atonement of making his trespass as brief as possible. His inducement to trouble the House at all grew entirely out of the circumstances of views having been stated in support of the resolution, in which he could not concur, and to which he should be considered as assenting if the grounds of his vote were not explained. The delicate relation of the question, however, to the slaveholding States, would furnish sufficient excuse to any member, coming from that quarter of the Union, for wishing to bestow on it the fullest examination.

Mr. A. proceeded to remark that, whilst he utterly disclaimed the consequences which had been inferred from it, he was by no means prepared to contest the right of the States to admit the colored person, born within their respective limits, to the privileges of citizenship. The States had delegated, in relation to this subject, only the power of naturalization, the operation of which was known to extend only to persons born beyond the limits of the community, by whose authority it was exerted. The collateral connected power of determining the right and condition of admission to the privileges of citizenship, as respected persons born within their respective limits, could not, then, be denied to the States, or abridged in its exercise, without a construction which might equally be employed to divest every other reserved right, and to dismantle every safeguard to be found in the Constitution. We had been told, indeed, that the exercise of this right in relation to colored persons, could not be considered as contemplated by the Constitution of the United States. Supposing it were not, the rights of the States did not depend, for their validity or exercise, on the recognition of the Federal Constitution, which, in its true character, was no more than the source of the limitations on them; nor had the advance of encroachment yet reached a construction, by which the security of these rights would not simply be impaired, but their independent existence absolutely subverted. The mode, too, of the derivation of the inference which excluded the exercise of the right in question, was as little warranted as the source of its derivation. It was derived, not from any thing in the language of the Constitution, but from the peculiarity of the circumstances of some of the parties to it, which were supposed to preclude the intention to allow such an exercise of right. This was not a case, however, in which a resort of this kind was admissible, for the ascertainment of intention. Where language was of doubtful import, this resort might be admitted with little danger, because there was a limit to the possible variety of interpretation of which language was susceptible. But where there was no doubt arising in the interpretation of language, nor any language on the subject of doubt to be interpreted, the allowance of a resort to the circumstances of parties, to an instrument for the ascertainment of its purport, would be admitting the supply, and not the explanation, of an intention. To such a principle of substitution and enlargement of the operation of instruments, there was evidently no limit short of the exhaustion of ingenuity. It was better to admit any defect whatever, in the Constitution, than a liability so indefinite, to accretion and metamorphosis.

The objection to the recognition of the right in question was founded in an entire misapprehension of the consequences of its exercise. It had been supposed that if the right were admitted, it would follow that colored persons, emigrating from a State in which they were allowed the privileges of citizenship, to another in which they were excluded from these privileges, would become entitled to all privileges of this character in the State to which they removed, notwithstanding the exclusion. Such an inference was founded on a view which was altogether erroneous of the operation of the first clause of the second section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States, assuring a reciprocity of privileges to the citizens of the several States, respectively. That clause, like every other, in that or any other instrument, must receive a construction which would not violate reason; which would not carry the operation of the clause beyond the intention which dictated it, and which would render its operation consistent, if possible, with the established rights of other parties. All these incontrovertible principles of interpretation would be violated by the construction which had been supposed. If persons removing from one State to another were to be considered as becoming entitled, under the operation of this clause of the Constitution, to all the privileges of citizens of the State to which they removed, and were not restricted to the privileges accorded to persons of the same class and description with themselves, then the anomaly would be presented of a foreign co-ordinate legislation, exerting a more efficient operation in the States than their interior legislation, and of their legislation exerting in relation to the same subject, a more efficient operation abroad than it could at home. A construction involving such consequences was absurd. Clauses were to be construed in consistency with their intention. What was the intention of this clause? The States by the adoption of the Federal Constitution, became, to a certain extent, members of one community. It was an incident essential to the secure enjoyment of the advantages of this community, that they should be restrained from any power of inimical regulation as respected the right of removal from one State and settlement in another. This was the design of the clause in question; not to inhibit to the States nor to restrain the power of regulation, as respected the conditions of the enjoyment and exercise of the privileges of citizenship, an essential, infeasible portion of self-government; but to inhibit any power of regulation on this subject, to be directed exclusively against citizens removing from other States, any exercise of inimical discriminative regulation. The discretion was left unimpaired to adopt regulations affecting either the indigenous inhabitants or those removing from other States, provided these regulations were not rendered restrictive and peculiar in relation to this last description of inhabitants. Under this limitation the reserved power of the States was unsusceptible of employment to any serious or injurious counteraction of the social design of the Federal Incorporation. This construction had the advantage of reconciling the rights of the States with the clause of the Constitution in question, affording to each ample and uninterfering scope for operation. Any opposite construction led to the wildest and most unredeemed absurdities. No one could conceive it to be the design of the Constitution to communicate to persons removing from one State to another, privileges larger in number or value than they had previously enjoyed; yet, under the construction which was combated, such persons might not only acquire an increase of privileges, the privilege of suffrage for example, but blacks from abroad might acquire privileges to which indigenous whites were not entitled. Women, in one of the States, (Jersey) were, or had formerly been, admitted to all the privileges of citizenship, that of suffrage inclusive. Under this construction, women, in States where there was a qualification on suffrage, as in Virginia, might become entitled, by migration, to privileges from which a large proportion of the indigenous white males were excluded. Constructions of this kind were no subjects for discussion. Persons, by removal from one State to another, did not, therefore, acquire any further or greater privileges than were the allotment of the indigenous inhabitants of the same class and description.

Another consequence which had been imputed to the clause of the Constitution under review, fell with that which had been examined. It had been imagined that, under the operation of this clause, colored persons, emancipated on a condition of removal from one State in which they receive their emancipation, might be returned upon the emancipating State in the character of citizens. The validity of this interference was excluded by the remarks which had been stated. It was equally excluded by other and independent considerations. The condition of emancipation alluded to, would labor, at the time of its adoption, under no defect of validity, as presenting no conflict with any provision of the Federal Constitution.

It could not, then, be brought into conflict, and rendered invalid at any posterior time, or by any act of an authority not superior to that of the party imposing it, and which was no party to the compact in which this condition was comprehended. Yet, if the inference above referred to were just, this condition, the creation of a competent authority, and the consideration of a benefit to the party accepting it, would be liable to invalidation by the posterior intervention, not of a superior, but an extraneous and merely co-ordinate authority; and be liable not simply to invalidation, but to be converted to an instrument of injury and abuse to the party who had made it the subject of stipulation. An inference of this kind had only to be represented in its true character to be disclaimed.

The endeavor had been made to show that there was nothing in the clause of the Constitution of the United States, which had been quoted, which could be construed as prohibiting the State governments from subjecting persons removing from other States to any restrictions as respected the privileges of citizenship which it was thought proper to extend to indigenous inhabitants of the same class and description. The power of the States would be found, upon further inquiry, to extend to a point beyond this—to the capacity of prohibiting the ingress of citizens of other States, provided the exclusion were for causes affecting the individual merely, and not the class: that is to say, provided the exclusion operated by what, in the technical language of the law, would be denominated descriptio personæ, or for causes accidental in their access, and liable to removal. Thus, it would not be denied that a State might exclude citizens of other States, for contagious disease, by quarantine regulations; that it had competency to exclude for crimes, or to exclude paupers liable to become burdensome by regulation of police. What was the reason of the competency of exclusion in these cases? The reason had already been stated, the necessity of giving to the clause of the Federal Constitution communicating the privileges of citizenship, a construction which would reconcile its operations with the reserved essential rights of the States. There could be no danger of abuse from this construction, as long as its principle was not transcended, which required that the exclusion should be for cause affecting the individual, and not the class. Mr. A. went on to say, that perhaps a just application of the principle of exclusion, which had been now stated, might be considered as authorizing the slaveholding States to prohibit the entry and settlement among them of colored persons from other States, inasmuch as it was known that the peculiar circumstances of their population tended to communicate to the admission of persons of this description a character of mischievousness, worse than that which would attach to the admission of pauperism, and as bad as that which would attach to the admission of criminals and disease. Mr. A. said, that he did not mean, however, to push the argument to this extent. It was not necessary to his purpose to do so. Perhaps it would not be fair, as the exclusion might be said, in these circumstances, to be denounced for a cause not personal, that is to say, accidental to the excluded object; or which, indeed, was not to be considered as residing so much in the excluded object, as in a peculiar condition of the community from which the object was proposed to be excluded. All that it was now designed to show was, that, notwithstanding the sweeping operation which had been attributed to the clause of the Federal Constitution, which had been adduced in the debate, the exercise, under certain circumstances, of a power of exclusion by the State governments, as respected the citizens of other States, was in perfect consistency with that operation.

If it was the wish of any of the States to have colored citizens, Mr. A. said, that he felt neither wish or authority to derogate from their right to do so. The proposition he denied was, that such citizens could be imposed on other States, who had no participation in the wish. In the lapse of time it was possible that the period might arrive, when, from the excessive multiplication of the mixed race, some of the slaveholding States might conceive themselves required, by considerations of policy, to admit this description of persons to a qualified or absolute enjoyment of the privileges of citizenship. Without pretending to express any opinion that such a period would arrive, Mr. A. could not, in the event of its occurrence, consider the competency of the State to exercise the power as a subject of question. The demarcation of color, importing a discrimination not simply of complexion, but blood, was too indefinite to be admitted as a limitation on State right. In all the slaveholding States, in a certain stage of intermixture, the legal distinction ceased. If the State right were confined in the mode supposed, there was no competency to assign the limit of this distinction.

He was not unaware, Mr. A. said, that the language he had been holding, of guarded respect for State rights, had been for some time going out of fashion. It was but too obvious to remark, that the essential defences of the States were rapidly giving way before the steady and powerful current of Federal authority. This circumstance only rendered more imperative, however, the duty of using every endeavor to sustain even the feeblest of these defences. The scope of public duty under a free constitution was peculiar. Its first object was the support of the Constitution. How was this to be effected? Not by carrying one principle victorious over every other, but by sustaining the balance between the various and conflicting principles which made up the composition of a free constitution. And how was this secondary incidental object to be effected? By enlisting on the side of the principle which, in the progress of the conflict, had been found to decline and become the weakest. It was upon a consideration of this sort, that Mr. A. thought the maintenance of the rights of the States, even in matters which bore the appearance of being immaterial and indifferent, ought to form a primary object of solicitude and effort.

The purpose of the remarks which had been submitted, was to show what Mr. A. conceived to be the just construction of the very delicate clause of the Constitution, assuming a reciprocity of the privileges of citizenship to the citizens of the several States, which had been so much referred to in the discussion. It had been seen that the recognition of the right of the States to admit colored persons to the privileges of citizenship, involved none of the abusive consequences which had been ascribed to it. The inquiry material to the present controversy next arose, whether any of the States had ever exercised the right; whether there were citizens of this description to be found in any of the States? Mr. A. thought that, upon due inquiry, it would be found there was no one of the States in which this class of persons could be fairly considered as assignable to the rank of citizens. He did not found this conclusion on any definition which had been, or, as far as appeared to him could be, given of the constituents or criteria of citizenship. He admitted that any definition which could be assumed upon this subject, must be regarded as gratuitous, and could, therefore, serve as the foundation of no conclusion. He admitted that there was no definition which would apply, under every circumstance. He thought that the only description which could be adopted, must be analogous to the definition which civilians gave of municipal law—"the rule which each State had prescribed to itself." But although there was no affirmative definition of citizenship which could be regarded as of invariable application, there was negative test which appeared to Mr. A. to be conclusive. Citizens might be admitted in various degrees to the exercise of political rights. They might even be admitted in various degrees to the enjoyment of civil rights. But those could not be considered as belonging to the rank of citizens, who, not by the mere operation of usage, but the positive enactments of law, were every where excluded from an equality with even the lowest rank of citizens, as respected the ordinary and most essential relations of domestic and social life. But this was the fact in relation to colored persons, as Mr. A. believed, in every State of the Union, without exception. Colored persons, as has been stated by his colleague, (Mr. BARBOUR,) were in no part of the Union permitted, by law, to contract with white persons that engagement, the liberty to contract which was the inseparable incident and criterion of a condition of social equality. He alluded to the engagement of marriage. How could persons be said to belong to the same class who were every where prohibited by law from the contraction of any relation of intimacy, and from association, on the basis of social equality? It was from the influence of this consideration, and not from any concurrence in various other views which had been stated, that Mr. A. derived his conclusion that colored persons could, in no part of the Union, be assigned to the rank of citizens.

But, suppose that these persons could be assigned to this rank in some of the States of the Union. Admit that there were citizens of this description. Ought the clause of the constitution of Missouri, to which objection had been taken, to be considered as operating upon such of these persons as were citizens? Mr. A. conceived that it ought not, upon the established maxim of interpretation, which had been stated by his friend from South Carolina, (Mr. LOWMEDES,) that where instruments presented the appearance of conflict, a construction was, if possible, to be adopted, which would reconcile their operation. If there were colored persons who belonged to the class of citizens, there was, notoriously, a much larger class who did not belong to this description, on whom the clause in question might be considered as operating without the involvement of any breach of the Federal Constitution. There was a distinct peculiar reason for the adoption of this construction. The term "free negroes and mulattoes," on which the doubt in the present case arose, had acquired in the South and West an import perfectly precise, and as it might be said technical, denoting a class who were invariably excluded from the privileges of citizenship. To restrict these words in the clause of the Missouri constitution to this sense, was doing no more than was required by another established rule of the construction, confirming the words to their ordinary and received signification. There was neither force nor liability to abuse in this interpretation, because the import of the language was not enlarged so as to be made to embrace something which it did not properly comprehend, but was restricted. It was another established rule that in cases of doubt, the most mitigated construction was to be adopted. "In obscuris quod minimum est querimus." But, in the present case, it also happened that the most mitigated was, at the same time, the usual and most received signification of the words to be construed. All that was asked, was, that the language should not be distorted from its customary and appropriate import, and a description applicable to, and designed for an inferior class of persons, be stretched to comprehend a higher class, in contravention of one of the most familiar maxims, that "minor non continet major." Cases analogous to the present might be easily stated from the Constitution. Mr. A. instanced the case of imports which the State were forbidden to lay unless with the consent of Congress, or for a special purpose. If Massachusetts, who was now engaged in the formation of a new constitution, were to insert a provision granting a power to her Legislature to lay imposts, would any court or reasonable man refuse to this clause a construction restricted by the competency of the State, and consistent with the prohibition of the Federal Constitution?

But let it be admitted, for the pursuit of the argument, that the controverted clause of the Missouri constitution was to be considered as inconsistent with the Federal Constitution, and void. Did it follow that the whole instrument and the act of admission of the territory into the Union, were, therefore, vacated? This being a question of the just interpretation of an instrument, must be conceded to be a juridical question, and its determination was, therefore, to be governed by juridical rules. What was this compact we had made with Missouri? It was a grant of the privilege of admission into the Union, subject to a condition of the due discharge of an authority to form a constitution of State government. Now what were the ordinary judicial rules governing the construction of the valid execution of authorities? If the discharge were inconsistent entirely and throughout, with the limitations on the authority, then the grant of it and all attending advantages were vacated. This was in effect the amount of what had been contended for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) in this branch of the discussion. But, if the discharge were inconsistent only in part, with the limitations of the authority; what was the just construction then? Was the whole discharge and grant of the authority vacated, or only the offending part? Unquestionably the latter only. The discharge, so far as it was within the competency of the authority, was valid, and for so much as it transcended this limit it was void. If a rule differing from this prevailed, what would be the effect of it. Under color of the correction of injustice, injustice would be perpetuated. The attempt to exercise authority not granted would be repressed by the invasion and divestiture of that which had been granted. The reality of usurpation by one party, would be made the corrective of the mere attempt at it by another. What, too, would be the inconveniences of such a rule? If the entire discharge of an authority were to be vacated, in the occurrence of any instance of defect, who would be found to accept the exercise of authorities? Who would be found to contract engagements, to undertake subordinate functions, to assume responsibilities under those who did accept the exercise of authorities? An authority to frame a constitution, from its extreme delicacy, was liable, in a peculiar degree, to this remark. But take the subject in another view. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) had conceded that the insertion of the controverted clause in the Missouri constitution, was to be regarded as the effect not of any designed invasion of the Constitution of the United States, (of which neither decency nor probability admitted the supposition,) but as a mere result of error or inadvertence. Then was the forfeiture of a grant so grave and beneficial as the admission of a State into the Union, to ensue on the commission of a mere error or inadvertence? Was such a principle of forfeiture ever heard in any system of jurisprudence? There was another test which appeared to Mr. A. to be of conclusive application in relation to this branch of the question. The States already admitted into the Union were at liberty to form new constitutions. Take an example from Pennsylvania, a State which Mr. A. believed had more than once remodelled its constitution, and in which there was said to be a party favorable to a still farther modification of it. Suppose Pennsylvania—such an instance of absurd and culpable fanaticism, though it could never occur in fact, might be imputed in the way of argument—suppose Pennsylvania, in new modelling her constitution, were to insert a provision, giving power to her Legislature to adopt protective regulations, in relation to persons held to service or labor in other States and escaping into that State, in contravention of the clause of the Constitution of the United States, which requires such persons instead of being protected, to be delivered up on the claim of those entitled to their service or labor. In such an event, would Pennsylvania stand discharged from her relation to the Union; or would the whole of her new modelled constitution be vacated? If the first of these consequences would follow, it was not improbable that there was no State which had re-organized its constitution, but would be found, upon a careful inquiry, to stand discharged from its affinity to the Union. If this consequence were just, a State committing, in the re-modification of its constitution, any act of the most inadvertent violation of the Constitution of the United States, was liable to be displaced from its affinity to the Union by Congress, who, it ought to be remembered, was said to be invested with an authority to exercise judgment without control upon this subject of the contravention by a State constitution of the Constitution of the United States. But, a State was not only liable in this view of the subject to be discharged from her relation to the Union by Congress, it also followed that she would have it in her power to discharge herself, by remodelling her constitution with that design, in contravention of the known principle that the Union could only be dissolved eo ligamine quo ligatur, by the consent of every State, or in any event of the majority of the States, to the dissolution.

Let it be conceded, however, that only the remodelled constitution, and not the relation of the State to the Union, was to be vacated by a provision admitting of being construed into a breach of the Federal Constitution. Was there any person to be found who would contend for this doctrine? If there were, how had it happened that, by parity of reason, the constitutions of the old thirteen States, all of which, perhaps, contained provisions inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, had not been invalidated by the adoption of this instrument? It would be said, indeed, that there was a distinction, in this respect, between States already admitted, and those applying for admission, into the Union. Mr. A. insisted, on the contrary, that there was no adequate ground for a distinction. The condition was the same in relation to all the parties to the Union, of obligation to conformity, in their legal and constitutional regulations, to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States. The power, too, of supervisal and control on this subject, on the part of Congress, was the same, namely, that which resulted from the operation of the clause enjoining on Congress the guaranty, as respected the States, of a republican form of government. The construction, then, being excluded which rendered a constitution liable to invalidation for one inconsistent and invalid clause, Missouri was not to be rejected from the Union, although a clause of this description should be found to have crept into her constitution.

But, whatever might be the character of the disputed clause of the Missouri constitution, the inquiry remained as to the competency of Congress to pronounce any determination on the subject. The question, as relating to the construction of an instrument, was obviously one of judicial character; and where did Congress find authority, either in the general principles of free government, or the peculiar structure of our form, for the exercise of a function of this kind? The reasons which opposed such an intermixture of functions, were of peculiar application to the present case. The most obvious was the unfitness, from habits as well as number, of a legislative body for the discharge of a judicial function. The Constitution had evidently contemplated this idea in the provision respecting the guaranty of a republican form of government; the character of a government, as respected its conformity to, or departure from, a republican form, being a subject which statesmen were as well qualified to decide as judges. The expression, too, it was to be remarked, of a jurisdiction, on the part of Congress, in this case, clearly excluded its jurisdiction in any other. A farther, and unanswerable objection to the jurisdiction claimed, was to be found in the absence of all responsibility, and the operation, indeed, of positive inducement to the abusive discharge of it. The discharge was known to be liable to influence from party and sectional feelings, obedience to which was assured, not merely of exemption from blame, but of reward and favor in the source to which responsibility was due. Suppose, for example, that the constitution of Missouri had been found to embrace a restriction on slavery: was the inference either unfair or illiberal, that the lustre of this feature would have given to the instrument a countenance so prepossessing as to blunt very much the disposition and power of observation to the defects which a careful examination might have detected in it? Could a jurisdiction, indeed, which assumed an undefined discretion in one of the parties to a compact, to interpret its validity, be regarded in any other light than as an affair, not of judgment, but power? What would be the effect of the recognition of such a jurisdiction in Congress, as respected the structure of the constitutions of States hereafter to be admitted into the Union? Would not the decision of Congress come to be regarded as a mere auction, and the fabrication of these instruments be converted from a concern of grave and impartial deliberation, into a bidding for the favor of a predominating party in this body? Waiving any insinuation of charge or imputation against the purity of the present times, would it be proper, by our recognition, to establish the jurisdiction contended for in Congress, to remain a precedent and principle of mischief to times which were to come?

But what was the foundation of this claim of cognizance, on the part of Congress, over inconsistencies occurring between the provisions of a State and of the Federal Constitution? The foundation of the authority to judge of the observance by a Territory claiming a place in the Union, of the conditions of its admission, was the supposed authority of Congress to prescribe these conditions. Conceding, for a moment, the authority to prescribe conditions, the authority to interpret and decide on their observance or violation, no more followed from it than a judiciary followed in any other case from a legislative power. In the present instance the principle, if it were put, would not apply, because the condition of admission which Missouri was supposed to have violated, was prescribed, not by Congress, but by the Constitution of the United States. What though the condition had been inserted in the act of Congress of last year, that the constitution of Missouri was to contain nothing repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, was the condition of any greater validity for this insertion than it would have been without the insertion? Would not Missouri have been as strongly and as unquestionably bound to its observance? Then the whole foundation failed, which had been assigned for the jurisdiction claimed for Congress, even if the principle assumed were a sound one. But this principle could not be maintained, in point of soundness, more than in point of application. It was not true that Congress was invested with authority to impose conditions on the admission of a State into the Union. Mr. A. had no design of going into the general argument of the last session upon this subject; but there were one or two considerations which admitted of being very briefly assigned, which to his mind appeared conclusive against the existence of this authority in Congress. There was one general remark, too, to be premised, applicable to all questions of the validity of exercises of power under the Federal Constitution. This remark referred to the peculiar effect which doubt as to its validity ought to have in preventing the exercise of power under this constitution. In other constitutions, in which general powers were given, subject to particular limitations, the doubt arose on the limitation of the power, and fairly admitted of its exercise, unless the negative proposition were established. But, in the Constitution of the United States, which was admitted on all hands to be a delegation of powers, limited by enumeration; in case of doubt, the affirmative grant of the power was required to be established to authorize its exercise. If, then, the power to prescribe conditions to the admission of a State into the Union were to be considered as in any degree doubtful, there was sufficient ground for its rejection. It stood condemned, however, by a much stronger consideration—its utter inconsistency with the discriminative principle and character of a federative government. The discriminating principle of such a government was the political equality of the parties to it. The amount of power intended to be granted being specific, and being made up by equal contribution of the parties, it followed that an exact equality must subsist between these parties, as respected the amount and character of the powers which were reserved. But, if conditions might be imposed other than those contained in the original charter of compact, on new parties to be admitted, what was the security for the preservation of this equality? How could it continue for a moment? How egregious would be the folly of guarding against undue acquisitions of power at the first inception of the compact, and permitting an unlimited facility of acquisition afterwards! The objection to the political inequality of the parties was not so strong in the case of a mere confederation of States, like some of the leagues which subsisted in ancient times, as it was in the case of a compact like our own, because the design of such associations, and the scope of the exercise of the powers with which they were charged, had reference to external purposes only. But these ancient leagues were invariably regarded by historians as having received their death-blow from the moment in which parties were admitted unequal, not in federative capacities or obligations, but in power and resources. Even in physical nature bodies were found to be of no consistency or duration of which the elements were incongruous. It was by the intermixture of dissimilar elements that a quantity of fragility was communicated to the hardest of them. Political bodies were liable in a yet higher degree to the same law of loss or diminution, as respected the coherence of their parts by impairment of their homogeneity.

Let this view of the subject be somewhat extended, and the conclusion would be rendered yet more apparent. In our federative system, the material line of demarcation between the Federal and State jurisdiction had reference to the distinction between subjects of general and of municipal concern. The first class was considered as forming, with some exceptions, the exclusive subjects of Federal authority. But, if a power were recognised to impose conditions at discretion on new States admitted into the confederacy what was to hinder, in relation to these States, the assumption of control over any or every subject of proper municipal cognizance? If, for example, control could be assumed over the subject of the continuance or inhibition of slavery, what hindered the assumption of superintendence over every other concern connected with the interest of property—its modifications as to kind, its tenure, its modes of acquirement and distribution? The principle of the assumption would evidently authorize its extension without limit. The reason assigned for control over the subject of slavery was the deleterious character of its influence. Inheritance by a rule of primogeniture, restraints on alienation, unreasonable prolongations of periods of apprenticeship, were liable, in an equal degree, to the same remark.

If, then, sir, Congress had the power of imposing at discretion conditions on States coming into the Union, it was manifest that it had a power of assuming control and jurisdiction, in relation to these States, limited only by discretion. The federal authority, designed for little more than an external safeguard, with respect to these States became liable to be converted into the pest of ancient times, invading the chambers of their retirement, and polluting the tables of their repast. As a power involving such consequences could never be admitted the right claimed for Congress to sit in judgment on the validity of constitutions of States demanding admission into the Union, which was founded on the supposed existence of this power, fell with it. It did not belong, therefore, to the province of Congress to pronounce the inva-lidity of the clause of the Missouri constitution, supposing it to be unquestionably invalid.

What, then it would be asked, was the purpose of requiring the submission of the constitution to Congress, which no one denied to be essential? The answer was obvious. It was to satisfy the clause of the Constitution of the United States which rendered it incumbent upon Congress to guaranty to every State a republican form of government. The duty of supervisal was expressly devolved upon Congress as respected the political character of the constitution of a State asking admission into the Union. But this duty did not extend beyond the political character of the constitution. On the contrary, its further extension was excluded by the operation of a known rule which had already been adverted to. This distinction between defects in a constitution of a State claiming admission into the Union, which related to the form of its government, and provisions which, although contravening the Constitution of the United States, yet were not of this particular character, would be found to furnish an answer to the various cases which had been stated, in illustration of the jurisdiction of Congress, in the debate. The particular case of the irregular nomination or qualification of members of the Senate by a new State, found a particular answer in the clause of the Constitution of the United States which assigned to each House of Congress the right of judging of the election and qualification of its own members.

The proceedings which had heretofore obtained in Congress on the admission of new States had evidently had reference to the mere formality of annunciation of the accession of the State to the Union. This was shown by the statement of precedents which had been given by the chairman of the committee. That no idea had ever been entertained of a necessity of a recognition by Congress of the validity of every part of the constitution of a State applying for admission, was proved by the fact that in cases of the formation of new constitutions by old States, in relation to which no defect of republican character could be anticipated, and no occasion existed for the annunciation of the accession of the State to the Union, the submission of the constitution to Congress had never been required; a proceeding which would be obviously indispensable in all cases, if Congress were invested with the cognizance of the validity of constitutions, which had been imputed to it.

It was not contended, it must be remembered, that there was no liability to conditions on the part of a new State about to be admitted into the Union. It was only asserted that those conditions were imposed by an authority paramount to Congress—the Constitution. It was not contended that there existed no corrective jurisdiction in the event of the violation of these conditions. It was only contended that this jurisdiction, with a particular exception, was referable to a tribunal better qualified than Congress, both by impartiality and competence—the Judiciary. If the jurisdiction belonged to the Judiciary, there were obvious and regular modes of proceeding for obtaining the effect of its decisions. If it belonged to Congress, there were none, and the want of them was evidence conclusive against the existence of the jurisdiction in Congress. The want of any regular remedy or means of enforcement, was the best evidence, in disproof of a claim of right or jurisdiction. If, in the exercise of the jurisdiction asserted for us, the constitution offered by Missouri, or any part of it, should be condemned, what was to be the effect? Missouri was to be rejected from the Union—that is to say, the mode of vindication of our authority was to consist in the discard of it. This was the case of the foolish constable in Shakspeare, deputing authority to the watch. They are to bid any man they meet to stand. But, how if they would not stand? Then they were to let him go, and to thank God they were rid of a knave. The exercise of authority recommended to us was analogous, and, if attempted, would redound in a similar occasion of consolation. It was said, however, that Missouri might be coerced by the re-extension to her of territorial regulations. This would be a proceeding little less anomalous than the other. Whatever Missouri might be in acceptance and fiction of law, it was notorious, in point of fact, that she stood discharged from the condition of a Territory. As there was no intermediary condition for which a name could be found, the Territory must have become a State. If with our authority, then, she was a member of the Union; if without it, what was her condition? Clearly a condition of separation from the Union. The fruit, then, of our exercise of authority was the alienation and loss of the subject of our authority. This right of jurisdiction claimed for Congress was like the right of insurrection in the people, a right which operated by the dissolution of all relations between the parties to it. Mr. A. was not stating these considerations in any view of the impolicy of the course which was recommended. He stated them in disproof of the jurisdiction from which such consequences flowed. His purpose was to confront this claim of jurisdiction with its results. He admitted that if the jurisdiction really belonged to Congress, there was no competency to remit its discharge to any other tribunal than Congress. What he contended was, that its attribution to Congress subverted every established idea of the character of a legal or political jurisdiction. It was, indeed, a further argument against this extraordinary jurisdiction that it was entirely superfluous, as the objects it proposed were attainable by the more regular and milder method of the exercise of judiciary authority. What, then, was the design of the mode of proceeding recommended to us, if its professed objects were to be otherwise, and with greater facility, obtained? Upon this subject it was proper to speak out. The design was to be let in to an unconfined discretion over the question of the admission of Missouri into the Union, for the purpose of reattempting the imposition of the slavery restriction. Upon this subject Mr. A. had, at this time, but one remark to make. It related to the change which had taken place in the character of this measure since the discussions of last year. The proposition then was to dictate a principle of civil institution to a people of whom we were neither really nor virtually the representatives. The character of the proposition at this time would be to impose the same principle against their avowed dissent, as a yoke upon their necks. If men, descended from the authors of the Revolution, could be found to propose a measure of this character, there were none boasting the same descent who could be found to yield submission to it. The reasons did not require to be adverted to; but every person knew that the measure could never be enforced. The attempt to enforce it might be effectual to the production of civil discord. It might be effectual to the production of the alienation and loss of the country. It might be effectual to the purpose of fixing the opprobrium of abortive usurpation on this House. But the direct object never could be attained. Better it was, therefore, that the rage of our fanaticism should be restricted to its proper domain, the discussions of this body, than to be let loose upon Missouri, whence its effects would be certain to recoil on those by whom it had been impelled. "Se jactet in aula Æolus," &c.

But let the preservation of the territorial character by Missouri be admitted, how perplexing was this anomalous complication of powers assumed by Congress in relation to the territories? Antecedently to the admission of a territory into the Union, an authority was claimed over it, limited only by discretion, which was but another name for a despotical authority. At the arrival of the period when admission could not, consistently with the principles of our institutions or former usage, be refused, the power was asserted of perpetuating our authority, in the form of the imposition of unchangeable conditions of political compact. The principle, too, of the imposition of these conditions, required no exclusive or essential relation between their character and the situation or character of the country and people they were to affect; but merely had reference to the gratification of visions which might be entertained here, of an abstract and speculative morality. The claim of Congressional authority over a territory, it would be supposed, must find a limit at this point. But it did not. The further power was asserted after a compact for the admission of the territory into the Union had been entered into, of a discretion on the part of Congress to judge of the validity of the execution of the compact by the territory, and, in the event of an unfavorable judgment, to remand to their former condition of vassalage the freemen by whom it was inhabited. For such a system of complicated despotism, Mr. A. said that he could find no name or description, which would adequately express its character, or truly convey his sense of detestation.

One word as to the consequences of the proceedings which might now be adopted. One gentleman had said, that no consequences of unpleasant character could be anticipated; and another, that the consequences, whatever they might be, were not to be taken into consideration. Both gentlemen were mistaken. Whatever might be the real views which would dictate the rejection of the resolution under discussion, this rejection, in the present state of the public mind, would be liable to be ascribed to the policy of re-attempting the imposition of the slavery restriction of last year. In the best event, then, the wound inflicted on the harmony of the country would be incurable. But, if the policy imputed was really to be acted on, every man must perceive that the Union was gone. Gentlemen might conceive that they were sowing the seeds of sectional influence and importance, but they would, in fact, be sowing a crop like the dragon's teeth, which would spring up in civil discord, and armed men, destined to perish in unnatural warfare, by a mutual destruction. It had been remarked the last year, that a gulf, similar to that which we read of in the early history of Rome, had been opened among us by the discussions on this subject. There was one circumstance, however, of favorable distinction. The chasm which was said to have occurred in Rome was only to be closed by the sacrifice of her most precious possession. But the chasm which had occurred in our harmony, required to heal it, only the most worthless of all sacrifices, that of our passions, or of what, in their application to human affairs, were the next most pestilent things to vile passions—our abstract and speculative notions. In what he had been saying, Mr. ARCHER disclaimed any intention of employing the language of menace, which would be suitable neither to his character, nor to that of the place in which he stood. His purpose was to express his sincere views of the possible consequences of the measures which Congress might adopt in relation to this important subject. The train had already been prepared by antecedent events and discussions. It now only required to be fired to produce effects which it would be equally impossible to avoid lamenting, or to repair. Mr. A. would add only a single remark. It was that, in the event of the real occurrence of the effects to which he had been alluding, their authors would stand chargeable with the greatest crime which had ever been committed against the interests of human nature, inasmuch as they would have led to the destruction of the most persuasive model of free institutions, and the overthrow of the most imposing promise of splendid destinies, which the world, in any age of it, had ever seen.

When Mr. ARCHER had concluded—

Mr. HILL, of Massachusetts, moved an amendment, qualifying the assent of the admission of the new State into the Union by an exception of a particular clause of the constitution. This motion, however, was withdrawn by Mr. HILL for the present, on the representation of Mr. LOWNDES, that it would embarrass the main debate, by bringing on an incidental one, and would deprive him of the opportunity of replying to some objections he had not anticipated, and to others arising from a misapprehension or evasion of his first arguments in support of the resolution.

Mr. BALDWIN then moved to strike out the preamble to the resolve.

Mr. LOWNDES assigned briefly the reasons why, on more mature reflection, he should assent to this course, though he had at first preferred the other.

The question being taken on striking out the preamble, was decided in the affirmative—87 to 65.

Mr. HEMPHILL observed that the subject before the House, in its various relations, had occupied so much of the time of Congress, that it was becoming in him to make an apology for rising, and to promise, at the least, to be as brief as possible. He said he would make no exordium, but engage at once on the merits of the question.

The constitution of Missouri, as transmitted to Congress, enjoins, in the most positive manner, and makes it the unqualified duty of the Legislature to pass, as soon as may be, such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, the State, under any pretext whatsoever. If these free colored people are embraced in the second section of the 4th article of the Constitution of the United States, it is most clear and manifest that the constitution of Missouri is a direct infringement of the Constitution of the United States, and repugnant to it.

The section in the Constitution of the United States to which I have alluded, declares that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States. The main question, according to my conception of it, involves but this single inquiry—Are free negroes and mulattoes, or any of them, citizens of the United States? The report of the honorable committee, as I thought, admitted the fact of citizenship; and this circumstance led me from making any examination on that point, until the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) yesterday assumed the broad ground of denying the rights of citizenship to any free black or mulatto man. He has endeavored to give us a definition of a citizen of this country; and although I acknowledge that the gentleman's reflections on the subject were ingenious, I cannot give my assent to their accuracy. He supposes that a citizen means a person who is entitled to all the civil rights of others in like circumstances, unless deprived of some of them for personal reasons. He then proceeded to show that discriminations existed, in a variety of instances, and in different States, between the white and black people; but this definition cannot be a good one, unless he is capable of proving that, among citizens, a majority have no right to make any such discriminations. What is there to control the will of the majority when it does not come in collision with any higher power?

Discriminations are familiar to us, in the several States, both as to political and civil rights; but it never was believed that they effected a total extinguishment of citizenship. Some citizens are entitled to vote, and others are not. Some are exempted from serving in the militia, or on juries, for various reasons; and this throws an unequal burden on the rest of the community. Paupers are not allowed even to choose the place of their residence. In some cases whole professions are distinguished from others; as, for instance, when ministers of the gospel are made ineligible to office. Provisions of this character are contained in several of the State constitutions; I will, however, only read a clause or two on this subject, from the constitution of Tennessee:

"1. Whereas ministers of the gospel are, by their profession, dedicated to God and the care of souls, and ought not to be diverted from the great duties of their functions, therefore, no minister of the gospel, or priest, of any denomination whatever, shall be eligible to a seat in either House of the Legislature.

"2. No person who denies the being of a God, or a future state of rewards and punishments, shall hold any office in the civil department of this State."

The latter description of persons are citizens, although their infidelity afflicts them with a much deeper misfortune than to be distinguished from the white people, merely by the circumstance of color. Females are also citizens, but they by no means fall within the given definition, particularly in the sense in which it is intended to operate on political rights.

The gentleman has put many cases in illustration of his definition. It is unnecessary to refer to each case—I will select two only, on which I am desirous of making a few observations.

The first is on an argument deduced from a law in the State of Massachusetts which, in the opinion of the gentleman, seemed to be entitled to peculiar force, as being the offspring of a State so celebrated in espousing the cause of this race of people. It is a law by which marriages are forbidden between the white and the black people; but if this circumstance proves any thing, it proves too much, because it equally abridges the rights of both, and the argument destroys itself; for if, on that account, a black person is not a citizen, how can the white person be a citizen? And besides, it will be found, by an inspection of the law, that the penalties or fines are imposed only on the white people.

The other case stated is, that the black people are exempt from serving in the militia. But I do not consider this as a deprivation of a right: it is a privilege, and is so esteemed, when the indulgence is granted to persons advanced in age. The colored people might be compelled to form in companies by themselves, so as not to be the associates of the white soldiers, as was the case in the Revolutionary war. I have taken this brief notice of the definition by endeavoring to show its inaccuracy when applied to the complex system of our Federal Government.

We shall arrive with more safety at the knowledge whether any free black people are citizens or not, by considering their acknowledged situation in a general point of view. And, at this stage of my remarks, I beg the House to recollect that, previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, each State had the unquestionable right of saying who should compose its own citizens; and if, at the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, free negroes and mulattoes were citizens of any one State in the Union, the Federal Constitution gave to such citizens all the privileges and immunities of the citizens in the several States.

I have examined the constitutions of the several States, and there are but seven or eight that, in terms, exclude the colored people from voting: In these constitutions the right of suffrage is confined to white persons; but this affords a very forcible argument that it was the opinion of the members of their convention, that black people should have been included under the general term of citizens.

In the Kentucky constitution, the understanding of the convention appears plain. The words are. "Every free male citizen, (negroes, mulattoes, and Indians, excepted.)"

Under the old constitution, in Maryland, this description of people voted; but the general terms were changed, by the present constitution of that State, to every free white male citizen.

In North Carolina, I understand that they still vote at elections. In Pennsylvania, there have been instances of their voting, but they are seldom. In several of the New England States they exercise this right, and did so in choosing the delegates who formed the Federal Constitution. In Massachusetts, and in the State of New York in particular, they enjoy the acknowledged and uninterrupted right of suffrage; and the constitutions of these States are both antecedent to the Constitution of the United States. The question might be very safely rested on the correctness of the opinions entertained in these two respectable States on the subject. The situation of the black people in these States was known anterior to the Revolution, and at the time of the acknowledgment of our independence; they were of course the best capable of judging, and were the only persons who had the right to judge whether these free people were embraced in the general terms of their constitutions.

When our different constitutions were formed, this class of people lived among us, not in the character of foreigners; they were connected with no other nation—this was their native country, and as dear to them as to us. Thousands of them were free born, and they composed a part of the people in the several States. They were identified with the nation, and its wealth consisted, in part, of their labor. They had fought for their country, and were righteously included in the principles of the Declaration of Independence. This was their condition when the Constitution of the United States was framed, and that high instrument does not cast the least shade of doubt upon any of their rights or privileges; but on the contrary, I may challenge gentlemen to examine it, with all the ability they are capable of, and see if it contains a single expression that deprives them of any privileges that is bestowed on others.

They have a right to pursue their own happiness, in as high a degree as any other class of people. Their situation is similar to others, in relation to the acquirement of property, and the various pursuits of industry. They are entitled to the same rights of religion and protection, and are subjected to the same punishments. They are enumerated in the census. They can be taxed, and made liable to militia duty; they are denied none of the privileges contained in the bill of rights; and, although many of these advantages are allowed to a stranger, during his temporary residence, yet, in no one instance is a free native black man treated as a foreigner.

When they enjoy all these rights, civil and religious, equally with the white people; and when they all flow from the same constitutions and laws, without any especial designation or reference to them, I have a curiosity to learn upon what principle any right can be singled out, as one of which they are to be deprived.

I appeal to the public transactions in this country, to the different constitutions, and to the laws, for the correctness of this position; that, whenever exceptions are intended to be made in regard to this class of people, that it requires express provisions for the purpose. It is said that they are not witnesses in some States; but it requires a particular law to render them incompetent to give testimony.

As citizenship has not been defined in any of the conventions, or by any of the wise assemblages of men in this country, it would be rash in me to attempt to give any thing like a confident definition; but, if being a native, and free born, and of parents belonging to no other nation or tribe, does not constitute a citizen in this country, I am at a loss to know in what manner citizenship is acquired by birth. This would be broader than necessary for the present occasion, as it would exclude the children of manumitted slaves. In England, from whence we adopt many of our customs, the sons of aliens are deemed natives; though the case is said to be different in many other countries.

When a foreigner is naturalized, he is only put in the place of a native freeman. This is the general idea of naturalization.

The word citizen, in its original sense, I believe, only meant a free person of a city; it had no application here until after our independence; and then it had to be accommodated to the customary and peculiar character of our complex system. In our political acceptance of the word, it differs in theory and origin from allegiance; that was a feudal connexion, acknowledging the distinction of superior and inferior; it was a species of slavish tenure. But citizenship is rather in the nature of a compact, expressly or tacitly made; it is a political tie, and the mutual obligations are contribution and protection.

If our free black population should be impressed in a foreign port, how could we redress the wrong if we have no political connexion with them, if they do not belong to our political family? Previous to the Revolution they were British subjects, and they were dissolved from any further connexion with that nation at the same time with the white people; and it would be exceedingly strange, if, from that moment, they ceased to be connected with any political society. Cases are familiar where they assume not only the appearance, but the reality of citizenship. If they should engage in commerce, none of the regulations, as to foreigners, would be applicable to them. Can there exist any doubt as to their capacity of sustaining actions in the Federal courts in the character of citizens? But all our researches on this subject aim principally at one object; it is to ascertain what was the opinion of the patriots of this country, at an early day, respecting this question. This is a fountain, when reached, that cannot deceive us; and, in looking into the ancient records of this Government, we find that this very question attracted attention, and received a solemn decision. The fourth article of the Confederation reads as follows: "The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in the Union, the free inhabitants of each of these States—paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted—shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." This language includes every free inhabitant, whether black or white, and clothes him with all the privileges of a citizen; and that this was the actual intention appears from the minutes taken when the Confederation was agreed to, (first volume of the laws of the United States, page 26.) When the fourth article was under consideration, the delegates from South Carolina being called, moved the following amendments in behalf of their State: 1. In article fourth, between the words free inhabitants, insert white—passed in the negative, ayes 2, noes 8, and one State divided. It was then moved, after the words "the several States," to insert, "according to the law of such States respectively," for the government of their own free white inhabitants, passed in the negative—ayes 2, noes 8, and one State divided—and in the Journals of Congress, in 1783, we are furnished with the opinion of Congress, on this subject, in terms equally clear and explicit, when it was resolved, with the exception of two States, one of which was divided, that all charges "of war and all the expenses that have been or shall be incurred for the common defence and general welfare, &c., shall be defrayed out of the common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the whole number of white and other free citizens and inhabitants of every age, sex, and condition," &c.

Here it is acknowledged expressly that there were other free citizens besides white citizens. If this will not convince gentlemen that free negroes and mulattoes were, from early times, considered as citizens, and composed a part of the people who chose the delegates to frame the Federal Constitution, it will be in vain for me to urge the matter any further.

I will add a few remarks on the subject of manumitted slaves. Among the Romans, as it appears from Cooper's Justinian, there were three grades; the first class of their freedmen were entitled to the privileges of Roman citizens; the other two classes were only allowed the enjoyment of inferior rights. What would be the condition of a manumitted slave, in this country, where the equal rights of man are more highly appreciated than in any other nation, I will not undertake to say.

In England, also, slight circumstances were caught at to effect the enfranchisement of persons held in villanage—such as the master bringing an action against his villain, which was construed to be the putting of him on an equal footing with himself. The idea that a free colored man, if a citizen, would be eligible to any office, however elevated, seems irreconcilable to the impressions of some gentlemen. But it will be recollected that this is an event that has never occurred in States where they are acknowledged to be citizens. The manners and practical distinctions in private life, which are observed between the white and the black people, will form a barrier, in this respect; as insurmountable as if ingrafted in the Constitution itself; and no danger need be feared that there will be any other commixture of community than we see at present. There are thousands of white people who have no better chance of being placed in office. I would not wish to see a practice prevail of putting them in situations that would create any disagreeable or unpleasant sensations; but this is no reason why they should not be allowed the practical enjoyment of such rights of citizenship as our customs and habits may approve of as suitable to their condition.

It is, however, wholly unnecessary, on this occasion, to trouble ourselves in drawing nice lines of distinction as to the propriety or power of abridging the common rights in regard to this class of people; for no one can gravely accede to the proposition, that a citizen can be denied the privilege of residing on the soil of his citizenship, when he has committed no offence; that he can be held in a state of exile without being branded with any mark of disgrace.

But, sir, as an exception to the general rule, the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. ARCHER,) who has just preceded me, says that they would be a nuisance in that State, and that this gives the right of excluding them, as an object of defence. This doctrine appears to me to be vague and fancied. What is our general idea of a nuisance? Is it not a fact to be ascertained by legal investigation? One man may be guilty of a nuisance, while another of the same color may be innocent; and shall a whole description of people be condemned and deprived of valuable rights without a hearing?

The same gentleman, to show the power of a State, has instanced the case of paupers, and alleges that they can be prevented from coming into a State to reside. Paupers are clearly distinguishable from other citizens, and perhaps may form an exception; they were expressly excepted in the old Articles of Confederation; their usefulness to their country is spent, and they fall helpless on the benevolence of the society to which they belong; they have no property to go to, neither have they any election as to the place of their residence; they are as a debt on their own State, and no other State is bound to discharge it; and I should suppose that every community would contain a power to protect itself against such palpable impositions, whenever designed to be practised upon it, as much so as it would have a right to prevent persons coming from places infected with malignant diseases.

I beg leave to represent this question in another point of view, for the reflection of gentlemen who do not believe that any negroes or mulattoes are citizens.

If Congress has a power, under the Constitution, to make such a description of people citizens, the clause in the constitution of Missouri is repugnant to the exercise of such a power, and would come in immediate collision with it. State constitutions must not stand in the way of any powers lawfully exercised, or which may be lawfully exercised, by Congress. Congress having the power of establishing an uniform rule of naturalization, could make citizens of this class of people, either out of the bosom of our own country or from foreign countries. The inhabitants of Louisiana were made citizens upon a liberal construction of this power, without any uniform rule. If Congress possesses this power, it is not material whether it is exercised or not. There is no bankrupt law at present; but if there had been a clause in the constitution of Missouri that no man should be divested of his estate by virtue of any bankrupt law, under any pretext whatsoever, such a clause would certainly be unconstitutional.

The words in the constitution of Missouri extend to negroes and mulattoes, in the most extensive manner. The design evidently was to prevent them from settling in that State, at any time or on any condition, without regard to the circumstance whether they were citizens or not.

It is observed by the committee, that a careful examination of the clause might perhaps countenance the opinion that it applied to the large class of free negroes and mulattoes who are not considered as citizens of the United States; but the words are too general and positive for such a construction. They allow of no pretext whatsoever.

Suppose the constitution of Missouri had declared that the militia of that State should be commanded by its own officers, notwithstanding any pretext whatsoever, would that be construed to mean when the militia was not called into the service of the United States? Again: if a clause had said that the State of Missouri might, against every pretext, lay imposts or duties on imports or exports from that State, would Congress give it their sanction, and construe it only to mean as far as might be absolutely necessary for the executing of its revenue laws? I am persuaded that the least reflection will induce gentlemen to believe that the clause will not bear the construction which the committee seem willing to give it.

The committee go on to say, that, of all the 'articles in our Constitution, there is, probably, 'not one more difficult to construe well than that 'which gives to the citizens of each State the 'privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States; there is not one attention to 'whose spirit is more necessary to the convenient 'and beneficial connexions of the States; nor one 'of which too large a construction would more 'completely break down their defensive power, 'and lead more directly to their consolidation.'

The doubtful apprehensions and difficulties raised concerning the construction of this clause, appear to me to be entirely imaginary; for I can perceive no part of the Constitution susceptible of a clearer understanding.

Suppose, for instance, that a foreigner should be naturalized in this District, or in a Territory; he would be a citizen of the United States, but not the peculiar citizen of any one State; still, if he should go into any State to reside, he would require no new adoption; he would be subjected only to the State qualifications, as to residence and the like, which would be equally exacted from its own citizens; he would, in fact, mingle with the citizens, and be one of them, and partake of all their privileges; and, so, if a citizen of one State should change his residence into another, he would be in a similar predicament. A citizen of one State, moreover, without removing into another, would have a right to take land by purchase or inheritance, and to part with it, at his own pleasure, according to the State laws; he would be entitled to all privileges that did not require actual residence, and could not, in any instance, be considered as a mere foreigner.

The report seems to countenance the idea, and the argument of the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Lowndes) enforces it, that a State may have existence antecedent to its being a member of the Union; and that, being a State, there is the same right to form a constitution as in the case of an old State; and if there should be any thing incompatible with the Constitution of the United States, it is a subject of judicial cognizance. This is correct, as it relates to an old State, for there Congress has no control over it. They are not one of the acting parties. The constitution is not to be submitted to Congress. The old State had made its compact with the Union, and if it does any thing inconsistent with that compact, it is necessarily to be corrected by the Judiciary.

I beg of the House to pay particular attention to this part of the subject. I understood the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. Lowndes) to be of opinion that a State is created as soon as Congress grant authority to the inhabitants of a Territory to form a State government, and the inhabitants accept of the authority given, and agree among themselves to form a State government. This is supposing that Congress has parted with all its power, as to the creation of the State, and has only retained the power to say whether the State, so created, shall be admitted into the Union or not; and, if not, that it still remains a State out of the Union. If the period selected is an unfortunate one, I am willing it shall be changed to the best possible period; for I maintain the principle that Congress has no authority to give existence to a State which shall not, co-instante, be a member of the Union; a single moment cannot intervene between its complete existence as a State, and its being a member of the Union.

New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union. This is all the power that the people have clothed Congress with. Congress has no right to create an independent and alien nation, to be composed out of the territory and inhabitants belonging to the United States. The creation of a State and its membership in the Union is to be considered as one indivisible transaction; as one connected object. If a State has complete existence, and standing alone, it must possess sovereign power. Its volition would be unbounded, and it could not be coerced into the Union against its own will. It might set the majesty of the old States at defiance. It is perfectly plain, that such a state of things could not exist under the Constitution of the United States; and this shows that it is a joint transaction; that the parties never lose sight of each other; and that nothing can be final and conclusive until there is a union of wills upon the admission of the State into the Union.

As Congress has no power to create an independent State—that which cannot be done directly, cannot be effected indirectly, by any accident or negligence on either side. The people have parted with no such power. Congress, in some shape or other, must consent to the constitution. There must be a mutuality of consent in this particular. For what other purpose is the constitution directed to be transmitted to Congress, if it is not to give Congress an opportunity to examine it, and give their opinion upon it?

The law of the last session contains a proviso, that the constitution, whenever formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. In whose opinion was it to be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States? Most unquestionably the understanding was, that it should be so in the opinion of the acting parties, and not in the opinion of any other branch of the Government. And how can Congress decide upon it until it see the constitution? It has been contended, that a State may be created prospectively; but this seems inconsistent with the nature of the transaction, and it cannot be supported, except on the principle of divesting Congress of every particle of power on the subject, after the enactment of the first law; for, if Congress has now a right of declaring whether Missouri has become a State in the Union, or not, it involves the question whether or no the law of the last session has been complied with.

This mode of proceeding would want order, without producing any change in substance; and it is evident that this was not the original opinion of the committee, as the resolution reads, that Missouri shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and is admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. In relation to this point the real question is, whether Congress will examine the constitution, and give an opinion upon it, either in what may be deemed a prospective point of view, or otherwise? And this is a principle which, in my opinion, Congress ought never to yield up. I think we should not be discharging the duty we owe to the people, if we merely pass a law authorizing a State to be created, and then abandon the case, and leave it to the inhabitants and others to say whether the constitution is republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. Congress expressed their opinion in the case of Ohio, by declaring that the constitution and State government had been formed in pursuance of the act of Congress; and no State has been admitted into the Union since, without the express assent of Congress, after seeing the constitution.

If it is the duty of Congress to express an opinion, the question is, whether there has been a compliance with the law of the last session? The proviso is a condition precedent, and, until complied with, no State has been, or can be, created. This was the basis and foundation of the authority. But both the gentlemen from Virginia say, that the objectionable part may be considered as a nullity and nothing. I confess I do not understand this kind of logic. Congress put in a law a solemn provision, that the constitution, when formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States; but the sober meaning of this is, that it is immaterial whether it is repugnant or not. If the law has been complied with, it is very well; but, what surprises me the most is, that it is equally satisfactory whether it has been complied with or not, as the bad part may be treated as a nullity. In principle it can make no difference how many parts are repugnant, as all may be considered as nullities and nothing.

It is asked if a bad part will vitiate the whole? That depends upon the nature of the case. In some cases it will, and in others it will not. But, whenever the whole depends upon a condition, that there shall be no bad part, then it will; and that is the case in the present instance. We must agree to take the whole or none. We do not know that Missouri will consent to come into the Union, if we undertake to change her constitution. If we do not accept of the whole, we must suspend the admission until there can be a further understanding on the subject.

The report goes on to consider the constitution in the light of an unconstitutional law, and, as a case peculiarly calculated for judicial cognizance. But, in every case in which Congress acts, it must judge, in the first instance, whether its law or resolution is Constitutional or not. Can we pass the resolution before us, which, in substance, declares that the constitution of Missouri is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, with a kind of mental reservation, that we give no opinion on this point? Why, sir, it is the solemn duty of Congress to refrain from doing any act if they even entertain doubts as to its constitutionality. In the case of an ordinary law, the courts, out of respect to the opinion of the Legislature, will not interpose, except in a plain case.

Some go so far as even to deny this right in the courts. But, on this occasion, gentlemen seem willing to transcend every notion that has heretofore been entertained on this subject, and to surrender at once to the supremacy of the courts, by which we shall make our own escape from all responsibility. For my own part, I do not see how this case could be brought before the Supreme Court in any reasonable time; but, suppose it could, Congress could not limit the court as to their decision, or point out what should be its effect. If the court has the power, they would judge of the extent of their power; and they might decide, contrary to the private expectations of gentlemen, that the proviso contained in the law of the last session was a condition precedent, and that, until complied with, no State had, or could be brought into existence. Whenever this bad news should reach Congress, they would be very unpleasantly circumstanced; the Senators and Representative from Missouri would have to leave their seats and go home.

Could the Judiciary expunge from the Union the States created out of the Louisiana purchase, upon the principle that the whole was unconstitutional and incompatible with the original design of the compact made between the old States? This, indeed, would be a gigantic power, and, as friendly as I am disposed towards the exercise of power in the Judiciary, I should be unwilling to acknowledge it, without much greater reflection than I have as yet bestowed on the subject.

If there is any case, in which it would be indiscreet and perhaps improper, for the Judiciary to interfere over the acts of Congress, I think it would be in the case of an admission of a State into the Union. I mean as it respects the main question, whether a State has been brought into the Union or not.

I have only, in relation to this part of the subject, further to say, that here is a resolution, on which we are called upon to vote: if we believe it to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, it is our solemn duty to reject it, regardless of the consequences. We cannot avoid giving our opinion upon it; and nothing can excuse us, if we make an unlawful breach, however slight, in the Constitution.

As to the condition of Missouri, there can be no middle station, it must be a Territory or State. There has been an ineffectual attempt to create a State, and the operation is a reversion to the old state of things—I mean in point of right; in point of fact, Missouri can make it what she pleases; but, it is most uncharitable to suppose, that she will rebel against her country, and assume the character of an independent State. I hope that gentlemen are mistaken as to the disposition of the people of Missouri. Why will they not peaceably submit to the will of the majority? How often, since the existence of our Government, have the minority been obliged to submit? What evidence have we, that the people of Missouri are less qualified to be good citizens? Is there any foundation for all this dread and apprehension, that they are disposed to give us trouble—I hope not, but that, on the contrary, it will be discovered, that they have as much anxious solicitude as the rest of their fellow-citizens, to preserve the peace and harmony of the country.

TUESDAY, December 12.

Mr. KENT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill to repeal part of an act passed by the State of Maryland in 1784, and now in force in Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, entitled "An act for an addition to Georgetown, in Montgomery county;" which bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. McCox, from the Committee of Claims, made a report on the petition of William T. Nimmo, accompanied by a bill for his relief.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Tennessee, the Secretary of the War Department was required to lay before this House such extracts from the inspection roll of the army engaged in the Seminole war, as will show whether or not the mounted men employed in that service continued to furnish, at their own expense, horses fit for duty until discharged; also, whether or not any rule was adopted, or compensation given said troops for their services, not made applicable, and given, to all other troops of the same description employed in the service of the United States.

On motion of Mr. PLUMER, the Committee of Commerce were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, that articles of export, inspected under the authority of one State, may be exported from any other State without being again inspected in the State from which they may be exported.

The House took up the proposition yesterday made by Mr. WHITMAN, so to amend the rules of the House as that the Speaker, in calling the States, should commence with Maine; and, after a little discussion on the part of Mr. WHITMAN for, and Mr. BUTLER, of New Hampshire, against the motion, it was negatived.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Comptroller of the Treasury, transmitting from the Fourth Auditor a list of balances charged in that office, and due more than three years prior to September, 1820; also a list of persons (only five in number) who have failed to render their accounts to that office.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War, of a plan on which the Army may be reduced to six thousand men; in obedience to a resolution of this House of the 11th of May last.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, relative to any alterations or modifications which he might deem necessary in the acts fixing the fees and emoluments of the officers of the customs, and a plan for compensating them according to their respective services; rendered in obedience to a resolution of the House of the 13th of May last.

The first named document was laid on the table, the remaining two referred to committees, and all ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO RULES.

Mr. RICH submitted for consideration the following, which, proposing to alter the rules of the House, lies on the table one day of course:

"A proposition, requesting information from the President of the United States, or directing it to be furnished by the Secretary of either of the Executive Departments, or the Postmaster General, shall lie upon the table one day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered, with the unanimous consent of the House."

In offering this motion, Mr. RICH said, it would, if adopted, require that a proposition calling upon the President of the United States, or the head of a department for information, should lie one day upon the table for consideration. He said, the experience which had been afforded him in the proceedings of the House, had taught him to believe that the respect which was due the Executive officers, and which members owed to themselves, as well as a regard to economy, suggested the propriety of the amendment. He said he by no means objected to the practice abstractly, of calling for information; but he thought that, while the House was in the practice of adopting such calls with the same facility that it instructed one of its committees to inquire into the expediency of adopting the most immaterial measure incident to legislation, if it did not at some times adopt calls of the kind unadvisedly, it was, to say the least of it, extremely liable to do so, and subject the departments to great labor in cases where no adequate object could be attained by it. He said he would mention one alleged fact, of the truth of which he had no reason to doubt, although he had it only from report, viz: that six clerks had been constantly employed, from the close of the last session to the present time, in collecting the materials to enable one of the departments to answer a call made at the last session. He said he would not allege that gentlemen would not have made the call had they known the labor which would have been required to furnish the answer; but sure he was that, in such a case, they would have considered the subject at least one day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills, and a resolution, of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of John Holmes, of Alabama; An act for the relief of Morgan Brown; and a resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union; in which bills and resolution they request the concurrence of this House.

MISSOURI.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the resolution for admitting the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, in soliciting the indulgence of the House upon the present occasion, I cannot avoid expressing my sincere regret, which none can feel more deeply, that the odious Missouri question should ever have been revived. After the discussion at the last session, after the excitement it had occasioned in this House and in the nation; after the deliberate decision of the National Legislature, connected with the principle of an honorable compromise, calculated at once to allay public agitation and reconcile conflicting views, and fully and fairly executed upon one side, as far as it was practicable, it was at least to be desired that it would be the wish, as, in my humble opinion it is the duty, of every friend of his country, that this subject should have been put forever at rest; and that the people of Missouri, mingling their interests and feelings with those of the other States, should have been permitted quietly to take their station in our

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

National Confederacy. But it seems that all these expectations are illusory, and that the ordinary course of public business is again to be interrupted by the agitation of a subject, which, I fear, cannot lead to any profitable result.

I admit, with the gentleman from Pennsylvania who spoke second in this debate, (Mr. SERGEANT,) that the subject has assumed a different, though an important form; but it still appears to me to have arisen out of the old question, and that its importance is derived much more from its effects upon the national tranquillity and the interests of our white population, than that class of persons whose rights are supposed to be affected by the Missouri constitution; who, as I believe I shall be able to show, have little interest in the matter.

I can assure the House that I feel no inclination to prolong the discussion upon so unpleasant a subject beyond that which every one must feel, to prevent any misconception of his course; and the best apology, perhaps, for engaging their attention at all, is to be found in the contrariety of views by which gentlemen who think with me have been conducted to the result. I do not advert to this circumstance with the least intention of undervaluing the arguments of those who enjoy so deservedly the respect of this House and the country; but it will always happen in the first agitation of great Constitutional questions, involving the principles upon which the institutions of the Government are founded, that a variety of reasons may lead different minds to a similar conclusion; and when I feel it my duty to avow that, I do not rely upon all the grounds taken by other gentlemen who advocate this resolution, I desire to be understood as saying no more than that they have not the same weight with me that they appear to have had with others.

I entertain no doubt that Missouri is not, at present, a State of this Union; and I am equally clear, that it is both the right and duty of Congress to examine the constitution which has been submitted to us; and, if it be found repugnant to the principles of the Constitution of the United States, refuse to admit the State into the Union. No State can of right claim to be admitted a member unless her frame of government is conformable to the principles of the confederacy of which she seeks to be a part. This was the doctrine for which I contended when I had the honor to address the House at the last session, and I have seen no cause since to change my opinion. I have, therefore, examined the constitution of Missouri, and am satisfied that it is republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

In the view I have taken of the subject, it appears to me to be more necessary to consider the obligations of Congress, than the actual condition of Missouri now, or what it will be if this resolution should be rejected. I am free to say, however, that, in my opinion, she is a State; for the people are in the actual exercise of State government. She is ready for admission into the Union, which could not be until the territorial disabilities had been merged in State sovereignty. We do not form a State by our act; we admit into the confederacy a State already formed by the people. Missouri would be a State if the objectionable feature were not in the constitution; she is not the less so because it is there, though it may be the means of keeping her out of the Union, and of thus producing new and very important relations with the United States. Whether Congress will possess the right or the power, should the constitution be rejected, of dissolving the State government, and of reducing the people once more to territorial subjection, is a question of fearful magnitude, upon which, though I have a very strong opinion, I feel no desire at present to make any observation.

The obligations of Congress appear to me to be equally clear. We have solemnly decided that we possess no power to impose any condition upon the people of Missouri as the price of their admission into the Union. We have so decided by rejecting an actual attempt to impose a condition, and by authorizing the people to form a State government, without any other restriction than the Constitution of the United States itself imposes. We have entered into a precise stipulation to admit the State, when formed, into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever. Our obligation is, to execute this stipulation in good faith—regarding matters of substance rather than technicalities. We are bound to admit the State into the Union if we can do so without violating the Constitution; and it is unworthy the magnitude of the subject, to be searching for some pretext by which we may escape from our engagement.

It must be admitted on all hands, that the constitution of Missouri is republican. To deny it this character because it does not prohibit slavery, would be to pronounce the constitutions of all the original States in the Union, and that of the United States, anti-republican. Nor should it be forgotten, that, as it respects the slaves, in regard to whom the proceedings of the last session offered some admonition, its provisions are both liberal and humane; conferring upon this unhappy class of persons greater rights, and guarding them with better securities than they enjoy in any State in the Union, in which they exist.

The only objection which is taken to the constitution, is founded on that article which provides that "it shall be the duty of the Legislature, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever." It should here be remarked, that the Missouri Convention could derive no lesson upon this subject from the proceedings of the last session, which, professing only to close the territory against slaves, could not be construed into a design to open it for free negroes. In announcing this course, too, the convention have proposed merely to model their municipal policy after that of a majority of the old thirteen States, and of those subsequently admitted, dictated, as I believe by no improper temper, but rather by the danger of an influx of this class of persons from the Southern part of the continent, who alone would be likely to go there. If this policy be right in the old States, it cannot be wrong in Missouri. We cannot charge Missouri with a violation of the Constitution, without pronouncing the same judgment upon the original parties to the compact; and I shall not be readily persuaded of the unsoundness of a doctrine which has regulated the practice of the State and General governments, ever since their organization; nor will I hastily pronounce the laws of half the States in the Union unconstitutional and void.

But, I proceed to consider more particularly, the character and extent of the objectionable provision; and I beg leave to remark, first, that of itself, it is entirely inoperative. It does not infringe the rights of any person whatsoever, nor does it prohibit any free negro from emigrating to the State of Missouri. It is directory merely to the Legislature to do so, and, until they have made it by their enactment, no prohibition does, or can exist. It is not, nor can it be known, that the Legislature will ever pass such a law; if the direction be unconstitutional, they never can. If they should, the law, and not the constitution, would create the prohibition; unless the Legislature should derive the power to pass the law from this provision. But, it cannot be pretended, that this clause confers on the Legislature any new or greater power than they would possess without it. In governments not republican, the legislature is the supreme power; in those which are republican, the supreme power is in the people; and under our system, therefore, the constitutions abridge, rather than enlarge the powers of the legislative department. The provision, then, instead of conferring new power, directs the Legislature to exert a power already in them, independent of the constitution, and depending for its efficacy in no degree upon the authority of the constitution. If this clause confers no new power, so it imposes no additional obligation upon the Legislature; it directs the exercise of a legislative function, upon the supposition that the right to exercise it exists, and that it may be rightfully employed. It does not require the Legislature to pass the law, per fas aut nefas, right or wrong; but to do so if they can consistently with their Constitutional obligations. In referring the subject to legislative interposition, the convention could have designed nothing else, than that it should act under the same responsibilities, and with the same regard to motives of State and general policy as in other cases. They could not have made it obligatory upon the Legislature to pass the law at all events, for this would have been requiring them to violate the Constitution of the United States, which their oaths, as members of the Legislature, bound them to support. Besides, if it had been the design to enact the prohibition without regard to Constitutional restraints; or to abridge legislative discretion, the convention, themselves would have ingrafted it upon their work, and not have referred it to the Legislature. The injunctions of the convention in matters of legislative cognizance must always be subservient to the higher duties of the legislator, the first of which is to pass no law repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

The direction in question, therefore, amounts to nothing more than that the Legislature shall originate the system, provided they shall deem it compatible with the Constitution of the United States.

If, therefore, this clause neither enlarges the power, nor increases the obligations of the Legislature of Missouri, the power of the State in relation to the General Government, and the checks and balances of the latter, are the same as they would be independent of it; and if the relation of the State to the United States, and the rights of the persons to be affected by it are the same whether the clause be in or out of the constitution, the Legislature will act, if at all, at the same peril, and under the same restraints, as though it did not exist, and it would be the law and not the constitution of Missouri which would be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, if either could be. How then can we say, that a clause of a nature perfectly nugatory, possessing no legal force or operation, which confers no additional power, nor creates any new obligation, but directs a legislative interference subject to the higher control of the institutions of the General Government, can be unconstitutional?

If this clause do not violate the Constitution, it is not possible for Congress to anticipate the passage of an unconstitutional law, and prospectively to pronounce it void, much less can we act upon such a supposition. Suppose, for example, that this clause were not in the Constitution, but that Congress had reason to believe, that it was the intention of the Missouri Legislature to pass a similar law; could Congress require from them, as the terms of their admission into the Union, a stipulation, that no such law should ever be passed? Clearly not; for this would not only be drawing to Congress the judicial power of revising State laws, which they never can possess, but it would amount to a condition tying up the functions of the Legislature, and denying it the same powers which have been actually exerted by the other States. Sir, as it regards the municipal laws of the States, Congress must always rely upon the sound legal discretion of the State Legislature not to pass unconstitutional acts, and upon the firmness and integrity of the national judiciary, to avoid them if they should. With regard to the present States we have no other reliance, and we need no other.

And why, sir, do we fear the Legislature of Missouri more than we do of those of the other States? We have stipulated to admit these people into the Union, and, wishing to avoid our obligation, we refuse to execute it, because we are pleased to suspect that at some future time their Legislature may pass a law, which we choose to determine would be unconstitutional!

But, Mr. Speaker, suppose the clause in the Missouri constitution be considered as making it obligatory upon the Legislature to pass a law conformable to its terms, is its compatibility with the Constitution of the United States irreconcilable? The clause in the latter instrument with which it is supposed to be in conflict, provides, that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all priv-

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

'illeges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Now, on this supposition, I do not require gentlemen to refer this question to the Judiciary, for I am prepared to decide it for myself; but, I ask them, when they attempt its interpretation here, to be guided by the same rules of construction, by which the Judiciary would decide, if it were before them. If the State of Missouri possess any power over the subject-matter to which the provision relates, then it is not altogether void; it is in part at least good, and we must give it a construction which will reconcile the powers of the State with those of the General Government; otherwise, we should deny to the State the power of acting at all, lest it might transcend its proper sphere.

It must be conceded, sir, that if there are any free negroes and mulattoes, who are citizens of any State, yet that the great majority of this class of persons in the United States are citizens of no State. As to these, by far the greatest number, the power of Missouri is complete; their emigration to the State may be constitutionally prohibited, and, so far as it may operate upon them, the clause is good. Missouri, then, has the undeniable right to prevent "free negroes and mulattoes" from acting within her State; and, in order to give any color to the objection, gentlemen are obliged to assert that the clause excludes all free negroes and mulattoes, including citizens of the several States. If Missouri had no power to prevent any free negroes from going there, the clause might be bad; but she is admitted to possess sufficient power to fill up the plain literal scope of the clause; and it can never be bad, unless the Legislature exceed even the limits of the injunction. It is fair to presume that the Legislature will do so, where they have neither a legal nor moral obligation to urge them forward, but have both to help them back?

It is our duty, moreover, sir, to give to the words of the clause that sense in which they are usually employed in all parts of the country, and by men of all classes; and in that sense they import, ex vi termini, that class of colored people who are neither slaves nor citizens. In a country where there are slaves who can become citizens, the middle condition of a man passing from slavery to citizenship can be no otherwise designated than by the terms here employed, since his freedom does not necessarily import citizenship. When we speak of a negro slave, we mean one who owes a lasting service to a master; when we speak of a free negro, we refer to him who has been set free by his master; and the appellation of citizen belongs to a higher condition and fuller rights. If we design to discriminate between citizens of different color, we should use the terms white citizens, or black or negro citizens, which have, I confess, to my ear at least, the sound of novelty. In common parlance, therefore, we use the term free negro in contradistinction both to slaves and citizens, in the same way as the freedman among the Romans denoted the middle condition between the bondman and the Roman citizen. The convention of Missouri could not have used the terms in any other sense, especially when it is considered that their principal design was to exclude this class of people, of idle and dissolute habits, upon their Southern and Eastern borders, who are confessedly not citizens, and known only as free negroes and mulattoes, rather than those in the Northern and Eastern States, who it cannot be supposed will be likely ever to wander into this Western region. But as this part of the subject has been pressed more in detail, and with greater ability than I could hope to employ, I will say no more in regard to it than that, while there is a sound, legal, rational construction at hand, which reconciles the constitution of Missouri with that of the United States, we are bound in a fair performance of our engagements to adopt it, rather than diligently to hunt after some technical objection by which we avoid the one, under the pretext of obeying the other.

But, Mr. Speaker, these are not the principal views which I design to submit, I confess that the great ground upon which my opinion is formed is, that the free negroes and mulattoes in the United States are not that description of citizens contemplated by the Constitution of the United States as entitled to Federal rights.

I do not mean, sir, to deny that these people have certain rights. I admit they have many; and these I would cherish, and, when consistent with the safety of the white population, enlarge. But their rights are of a local nature, dependent upon the gratuitous favor of the municipal authority of the States, and liable to be curtailed or enlarged by those authorities; they are limited to the State granting them, and confer no claim to similar privileges and immunities purely federal. Gentlemen must not only show that a free negro may be admitted to the enjoyment of some rights of citizenship in a particular State, but they must also show that he is of that description of "citizens" to whom the Constitution meant to guaranty equal rights in every State. The State authority may confer the right of citizenship within their State upon aliens and Indians; but it was never imagined that they would therefore be the subjects of federal rights. Nor could the Constitution have intended to refer to any description of persons whose privileges were matters of grace from the local municipality. For I take it to be clear, that no person can claim federal immunities who cannot claim, as a matter of right, the privileges of a citizen in the State of which he is a resident. A consideration of the nature of citizenship and the principles of the Federal Union, will show that the free negroes in our country have no such pretensions. An inattention to the distinction here taken has led to great misapprehension throughout the argument. Gentlemen have seen some few of these people voting in some one or two of the States, and have seized upon this circumstance as conclusive evidence of citizenship, without reflecting that, as a political right, it is the consequence rather than the characteristic of citizenship, and may depend upon the precarious tenure of the local Legislature, which, if it pleased so to order, might deprive a real citizen of the right of voting, while at the same time it should confer it upon an alien who could claim none of the essential rights which characterize a citizen.

I concur entirely in the definition of a citizen, as given by the honorable gentleman from Virginia on my left, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who has spoken with so much ability, and left I fear little for me to add. I believe that his definition will be found, in all its prominent parts, to be fully supported by the best authors upon the subject, as well as the reason of the case. I take it, sir, that a person, to be a "citizen" under one Government, must be a member of the civil community, and entitled as matter of right to equal advantages in that community. His rights result from his association with it, and of which nothing short of his own will or misconduct can deprive him. They are rights independent of the political power, and inalienable. They were anterior to the community, were carried into it, and their preservation formed the great object of the association. They may be modified, but cannot be destroyed, by the political power of the society. A State, for instance, may regulate the right of suffrage, and extend it to such only of its members as possess a freehold property; but it could not extend it to one freeholder and not to another; much less could it say that a citizen should not acquire a freehold; for it is the inherent right of every citizen to exert his mental and physical powers in the pursuit of happiness and for the acquisition of property, and to have his acquisitions protected. Our political system is founded upon this principle of equal rights in the members of the community, and any State regulation which should interfere with them would be unconstitutional. It follows, therefore, that those only are "citizens" who can claim these advantages as a matter of right; all others, and those whose privileges depend upon the grace or favor of the local authority, fall under the denomination of inhabitants and aliens, holding their rights at the will of the Government under which they live. Upon a subject on which so great a variety of opinion has been entertained, I pray to be indulged in referring to an authority in support of the exposition I am pursuing. It is remarked by Vattel, who, in this respect, follows Grotius, that "The citizens are the members of the civil society. Bound to this society by certain duties, and subject to its authority, they equally participate in its advantages. The natives are those born in the country of those who are citizens. In order to be of the country, it is necessary that a person be born of a father who is a citizen."

"The inhabitants, as distinguished from citizens, are strangers who are permitted to settle and stay in the country. Bound by their residence to the society, they are subject to the laws of the State while they reside there, and they are obliged to defend it, because it grants them protection, though they do not participate in all the rights of citizens. They enjoy only the advantages which the laws or custom give them."

"The perpetual inhabitants are those who have received the right of perpetual residence. These are a kind of citizens of an inferior order, and are united and subject to the society without participation in all its advantages. Their children follow the condition of their fathers," &c.

Of the two last of these classes, I consider the Indians and free negroes and mulattoes of the United States. The "laws and custom" nowhere give them the right of participating in all the advantages of society. Their actual advantages vary in almost every State; in some they are dealt out more liberally, in others with a sparing hand; in none are they complete. In some States they cannot be witness against the whites; in others they cannot be jurors; in none are they allowed to hold offices or to intermarry with the whites—a circumstance to which I shall more particularly advert hereafter. If they were citizens these disabilities could not be imposed upon them, but for some personal defect. The real truth is, sir, that they are nowhere considered as members of the civil society, but as inhabitants of the country, holding their rights at the will of the local authority.

It was competent, in the original formation of the societies which now compose this Union, to admit into the association, or to exclude from it, any description of persons whatsoever. Every one in any degree acquainted with the history of the first settlement of these States must know that the association was of white people—Europeans and their descendants. The idea of a mixture was at no time tolerated; even the aboriginal Indians were not received as a competent part of the civil or political community; but the country was settled, and the society formed, by a white population. It was essentially a white community. In its origin the black population could have formed no part of it, and throughout its progress the invincible barrier to a mixture of white and black, and the positive regulations of society, have perpetually excluded them. They could not, therefore, upon the principles of the association, and in the nature of things, be entitled to equal rights.

The American race came to the country posterior to the whites, and their original condition most unhappily was that of slaves. As such, they were clearly without the pale of the society; and it is equally clear that they never could be admitted within it afterwards, unless by some positive law, or by long usage and custom. They never have been admitted by either. In Pennsylvania, and many other States, they were expressly excluded from the benefit of the naturalization laws existing in the States, prior to the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

Where is there any positive institution providing for their incorporation into the civil community, or extending to them equal rights? Where is the State in the Union in which it is declared, by positive enactment, that free negroes shall be entitled to claim all the rights of citizens, and be entitled "equally to participate in the advantages of the civil" or political "society?" I never heard that there was one. The act of emancipation cannot have this effect, unless it should be so declared by some express statutory provision. Emancipation is the mere act of the owner; it is merely a relinquishment of his claim to the services of the negro; it gives freedom to the slave, but it is not competent for the owner, a single individual, by any act of his, to constitute him a citizen. This must be the work of the society at large. There cannot be a stronger illustration of this than that the right and form of the manumission of slaves is everywhere a matter of State regulation; under which they confer on the manumitted slaves only the rights of free negroes, not of citizens, distinguishing between the two conditions, and creating a liability on the owner to support the negro, if at any period of his life he should become unable to support himself. This would never be, if by the act of manumission the negro were admitted to the rights of a citizen, for in that case it would be the duty of the society at large to provide for his age and infirmities, and they would have no power to impose the obligation exclusively upon the owner. It is because he can neither incorporate with, nor attain to any rank in the society, whereby his means and inducements to provide for himself are diminished, that the owner is not suffered to cast him loose upon the community without becoming responsible for his maintenance. Sir, the doctrine is confirmed by the experience of all history.

The honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEMPHILL) has referred us to Cooper's Justinian to prove, that among the Romans a freedman, by the act of freedom, became a Roman citizen. But the gentleman overlooked the declaration of his author, that this was the case only by the express provision of the Justinian Code, and that until that time the act of freedom conferred no such privilege. Until then the three conditions of bondman, freedman, and citizen, were distinctly marked; the second being the middle condition between the first and last, equally removed from the disabilities of the one, and the privileges of the other. The gentleman's authority, therefore, establishes the position directly against him. But, I ask, Mr. Speaker, what analogy there is between the Roman slaves and those with whom this country is unhappily afflicted? Among the Romans the bondman wore the same color with the free population, and was no otherwise distinguishable from the rest of the community than by his subjection to his master; when his shackles were loosened, he readily mixed with his fellow men like a drop added to the stream, and floated on with the mass of the community to a common destiny. But very different is the unhappy African race within the United States. Their servitude is not their only distinguishable feature; they never can mingle or assimilate with the white population, more than oil with water. The liberation of the slave from his master pushes him from the shore, on an element where he is a stranger, on which he can make but little progress. He requires to be tutored, and disciplined, and guarded, to fit him for the humble enjoyments which are afforded him. His interests are dissimilar with those of the whites; he sees them enjoying rights and advantages to which he can never attain; his road to preferment is blocked up, and he passes on his journey without any common interest with those about him. It is for this, among other reasons, sir, that the institutions of this country have never imitated the Justinian Code.

I will not stop to notice more particularly than has been done by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) the stale argument derived from the abstract doctrines announced in the Declaration of Independence, and the comprehensive expression of "We the people," prefixed to the Constitution of the United States. Broad as they appear, every one knows they were limited. They did not include the slaves, nor the Indians, because they referred only to those who were members of our civil community; and, if my position be correct, for the same reason they had no allusion to the free negroes in the country. It is impossible they could have had, when in those States in which these declarations are the fullest, free negroes were expressly excluded from the advantages of their naturalization laws.

If, then, no positive law has incorporated these people with the civil society, but on the contrary has discountenanced it, who will contend that it has ever been accomplished by the usage and custom of the country?

Usage and custom are chiefly the result of our feeling, if not our conscience, and are seldom in opposition to both. There is no instance in history of any attempt at a mixture with white and black; the natural sense and feeling of all nations have been universally averse to it, and in any country where there is found a weaker caste of people, who cannot, by any possibility, mix and assimilate in common with the stronger, their rights can never be the same. Does not the custom of our country prove it to be so? I speak now of the fact; of what is, rather than of what ought to be. Is any one prepared to say, that there is a State in the Union in which the white and the black population actually enjoy or claim equal rights? It is said, to be sure, that in one or two, the bills of rights make no discrimination; but in these, what construction have the usage and custom and laws put upon these abstract declarations? In some we have seen that they do not confer the fundamental right of being naturalized. And where can they boldly claim the enjoyment of equal rights, in defiance of the local authority? It is said, too, that in one or two States they are allowed to vote, and some have voted. But I have shown you that the right to vote is no test of citizenship; it is dependent on legislative favor, in part, and may be conferred on aliens and others, and taken away again, if it be not founded on the claim of citizenship; and therefore, if the free negroes only exercise it as a matter of grace merely, it gives them no claim to Federal immunities. What, sir, is the evidence of this right of voting? In how many instances has it been exercised? In all the political struggles to which the States have been doomed, where is the wildest partisan who has stemmed the indignant sense of the community by enlisting electors from such ranks? Sir, if it exist, it is in theory; if exerted, it is by stealth, as if apprehensive of its legitimacy; it is not commonly practised; for the usage and custom of society are against it. From what does this result, sir? From every man's own sense of the insuperable disparity which exists between white and black, as to every qualification on which the right of suffrage is founded. The white man looks at his associations, civil and political; he reflects upon the history of his municipal institutions; he surveys the relative situation of the black to the white population; he knows the unhappy condition from which the unfortunate African has emerged; and whithersoever he turns, he finds the actual condition of things marked by a line of discrimination stronger and more durable than laws of brass or iron. Founded in the natural sense of the community, it has become the common law of the land. If usage and custom have conferred equal rights, where have these people held offices, from the highest to the lowest? Where even have they been admitted with whites as members of petty incorporations? If they have never exercised, how can they claim the right by usage? And, sir, their exclusion from these is not the result of incapacity, or the humbleness of their station: for the poorest white man often fills some office of trust and profit; but it is the result of other and deeper causes.

Sir, a different and common usage and custom lie at the foundation of all our legislative provisions, in regard to these people; and the laws of the States have come in aid, and gone in advance of this usage and custom; and I beg leave to remind the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HEMPHILL,) who attempted to found an argument upon the supposed necessity of legislative interference, that it has never been resorted to, but for the purpose of curtailing rights which did not appertain to these people as citizens, but belonged to them in common with aliens and residents merely.

All freemen have the capacity to be witnesses, jurors, and to serve in the militia; but, in most of the States, these are denied to free negroes by the municipal laws. These regulations do not make, they are founded on the previous discrimination existing in fact; they are called for by the feelings of society. Why cannot a free negro be a witness against a white man, as a foreigner or an Indian may? It is because the custom of society, having drawn a discrimination between the white and the black, disparaging to the latter, the law deems it safe and wise to deprive him of the means of gratifying feelings which such a condition might engender. Some of these disabilities, it is true, are found in some only of the States; but the most important one is found in all, rooted in the heart of the people, and enforced by the laws. In no State of the Union is intermarriage between white and black permitted. There are few men, as I hope, that would not revolt at such a union, and I know of no state of society in which such a connexion would not be indignantly reprobated; but yet, to guard against the possibility of a different feeling, the laws come in aid of and enforce the prohibition. If these people form a part of the civil society, which, in such a case, would be composed of a motley population consisting of all the variety of color, and if they are entitled to claim equal rights, by what authority can the right of forming a marriage contract be annulled? Sir, this fact proves the whole argument. It not only shows that these people are not members of the civil community, but that they can never become so, because the strong sense of the community is against it; it closes the only legitimate avenue to their amalgamation; it strengthens and sanctifies the moral feelings of society; it keeps the black man forever without its bosom, and perpetuates his discrimination. But, sir, it proves yet more; it is conclusive to show that the rights of these people, in every part of the Union, are dependent upon, and, in fact, the creatures of local jurisdiction and municipal policy. But one of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEMPHILL) has been pleased to say, that if the black man cannot marry with the white, so the white man cannot marry with the black, and gravely inferred that, therefore, the whites could not be citizens! This observation might, indeed, rather afford matter for amusement, than of sober reply; but, as I deem the latter unnecessary, I will not consume time in indulging the former. The same gentleman remarks, that these people labor and are taxed, and thus contribute to the wealth of the nation; but surely the gentleman cannot suppose that these are among the rights or characteristics of citizens! they are incident to the emigrant as to the citizen, and to the aliens and civilized Indians in common with the free negroes in the United States; and, the gentleman ought to remember that while the free negro can labor and be taxed, he is denied the equal privilege of managing and holding office in common with the alien, the resident, and other inhabitants merely.

I assume the position, then, as proved, that, at the formation of the Constitution of the United States, the free negroes and mulattoes were not entitled to equal rights; they were in the nature of perpetual inhabitants, and the objects of local municipalities. This was their country, because they had no claim to any other, and their claim to residence grew out of the fact that they had been brought here by the whites, against their will, and became, on that account, entitled to protection and the other rights of perpetual inhabitants; all of which, however, are confined to the particular State of whose territory they are the inhabitants.

If such were their condition, then, it is impossible that it could have been changed since; the naturalization system of the United States being confined to whites. Now, sir, the rule is, as I have already shown, that the issue follows the condition of their fathers; and the children of the free negroes, though born in the United States, have no greater rights than those which belonged to their fathers. This is the law of nature, and applies to these people now, unless it has been altered by some positive law or by common custom. The British Constitution and the naturalization law of the United States, have, I admit, departed from this rule; but the latter is expressly confined in all its provisions to white persons; and as it was necessary to make the positive variation in regard to them, the inference would appear to be inevitable that the rule remained in force, with regard to all others. The rule of the British system never did apply, and for the plainest of reasons. That system, consisting of a train of immemorial usages, and customs, and of acts of Parliament, did not apply to their colonies, only so far as they were immediately applicable to their situation, or actually adopted by them in practice. Now, this provision of the British Constitution was wholly inapplicable to these colonies, as it respects their black population. In England it had reference only to a white population; it knew no mixture, and it never contemplated any.

But, if it could have applied, it never was adopted in practice, but expressly excluded and repudiated in all the States. There is no instance in which the laws or custom have discriminated between the free negro by emancipation, and his issue born in the United States; no instance in which the issue have enjoyed greater rights, by usage, than their progenitors; they have always been placed upon the same footing.

The same causes which begat the discrimination as to one generation, have perpetuated it, and will continue to do so in every other. I have not entered into a discussion of the right of all this, but have argued from the fact. I have set the universal usages of society against the abstract doctrine of equality, which is nowhere actually practised. But, sir, I should not shrink from the inquiry, if I deemed it necessary to be pursued. I am an advocate for some discrimination. I am an enemy to slavery; if I had the power, and could do so consistently with the safety of the white population, I would wipe it out of our history; but I never will agree to put the white and black population upon an equality, or to destroy the features of both, by the vain attempt to amalgamate one with the other! The attempt has never been, and never can be made; and I ask, sir, if we were now forming a new constitution, would any gentleman consent to place the black race upon an equal footing with the white? Sir, between these descriptions of men, reason and nature have drawn a line of discrimination which never can be effaced, till both shall be compelled to yield to the law of force.

The great question, then, Mr. Speaker, upon which I place this argument, recurs—Was it the intention of the Constitution of the United States to confer full federal rights upon this description of inhabitants? "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." The precise meaning of this provision is not entirely free from obscurity; and some doubts once existed whether the immunities to be enjoyed were those of the State from which the citizen removed, or of that to which he emigrated, though it seems now to be settled that the latter is the true import.

One thing, however, is clear, that it does not secure the right of only settling in a State, which is involved rather as an incident than a principal immunity in the general grant. It secures all privileges and immunities of citizens in the State, and includes the right of emigration, as necessarily incident to the enjoyment of these immunities. But, sir, it could never have designed to secure this right of emigration and settling in a State, to a class of persons who could not be entitled, after they got there, to all the immunities to which it led. It could never have designed to authorize a man to settle in a State, when the tenure and extent of his privileges depended upon the will of the municipal authority; and if I have succeeded in showing such to be the nature of the privileges enjoyed by the free negroes and mulattoes, the deduction would be inevitable. If the free negro of New York, on the allegation of citizenship by the mere exercise of partial and gratuitous rights there, can claim to go to Virginia, he would be entitled, on his arrival, to all the privileges and immunities of white citizens there, though he had previously enjoyed fewer rights than the whites in New York. Such a meaning, however, would be too preposterous to ascribe to the Constitution of the United States. It is unreasonable to conclude that the Constitution ever meant to alter the condition of the black population, or to interfere with the municipal authorities over them, so as to place all the States at the mercy of a dissolute, heterogeneous population of any one. Can it be supposed that the States would ever have entered into the Union upon the principle of allowing the free negroes in New York or Massachusetts to be placed upon an equal footing with the whites, in States whose own safety required them to deny similar privileges to their own native free negroes? Can any gentleman point out the interest which the Northern States had to require such a concession? Every thing connected with the history and formation of the Government proves that this class could not have been contemplated. The Constitution was the work of States composed of a white population, and designed to secure their interests chiefly; and to such of these who had perfect rights in one State, it guaranteed the immunities in any other. It was intended to make the United States a common country for such as were full members of the particular States. At that time, too, the condition of the free blacks was known to be as I have already described it; they were known to be a distinct class everywhere, and the creatures of local and municipal policy; certainly of an inferior order, and enjoying such rights as the policy of the particular State might think proper to confer. They were everywhere considered as inhabitants merely, who had not attained to the condition of citizens, and enjoyed only partially the privileges appertaining to the former class.

The language of the old Articles of Confederation, and the variance between them and the present Constitution, offer the best illustration of these remarks. The fourth article of the former provided, that "The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States, the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to 'all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States." The doctrine now contended for was the precise evil experienced under the old Articles, and led to the limited phraseology in the present Constitution. This is demonstrated by every commentator upon the subject; and Judge Tucker, in speaking of this very clause in the Articles of Confederation, says, "It seems to be a construction scarcely avoidable, and those who come under the denomination of 'free inhabitants' of a State, (although not citizens of such State,) were entitled in every other State to all the privileges of free citizens of the latter; that is, greater privileges than they may be entitled to in their own State. Our free negroes, for example, though not entitled to the right of suffrage in Virginia, might, by removing into another State, acquire that right there; and persons of the same description, removing from any other State into this, might be supposed to acquire the same right here, in virtue of that article, though native born negroes are undoubtedly incapable of it, under our constitution." To avoid this construction, the present constitution omitted the words "free inhabitants," and substituted "citizens," evidently referring to those only who were entitled to full rights in their own State.

In immediate connexion with this, is the power in Congress to pass uniform laws of naturalization. The Constitution having secured to the citizens of each State all the immunities of citizens in the several States, it became necessary to vest the exclusive power of making citizens in the General Government, in which all the States should have a voice, to avoid the very improper power in one State of making citizens in every other. This power is clearly exclusive, and the States have no longer any power to create citizens in the sense of the Constitution. They may make denizens, and extend their local rights to aliens, to Indians, or to free negroes; but these give no claim to federal rights, which belong only to full citizens. Congress have excluded this power, and by confining it exclusively to whites, they have given the clearest exposition of its latitude. The applicant for naturalization must also show a certain residence within some particular State, by which he becomes identified with it, and not, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. HEMPHILL) has supposed, because of his residence within the United States generally. This exposition, too, was given by those who assisted in forming the Constitution, and therefore knew the scope of its provisions. It is impossible to suppose that the power to naturalize blacks ever could have been given, for it was at once repugnant to the policy of the country, and the nature of our institutions. It could never have been intended to authorize the naturalization of a class of people who were already a burden upon the nation, and who could not, by any possibility, assimilate with our society. In the execution of the other powers vested in the General Government, Congress equally recognised the disabilities of this class of persons; they excluded them from the militia of the States, and prohibited their employment as drivers of stages carrying the mail. Each of these is wholly inconsistent with the rights of citizenship, especially the former, since the right of bearing arms is the highest privilege of the citizen. We have been informed, however, that black men served in the army during the late war and received bounty land. I know not how this fact may be, but be it as it may, it proves nothing in the argument. Since, if they were not citizens independent of this, their services in the army and their title to land could not make them so. Congress may sell land to aliens, but the purchase of land is not equivalent to naturalization, and would not authorize the purchaser to settle in a State in violation of its laws. The fact that protections have been issued to free negroes from the custom-houses, which has also been mentioned, is not more important. The protection is evidence rather of birth and the claim of the country granting it, than of peculiar rights of citizenship, and is designed to exempt the party from the claim of a foreign Power. It would be given to an Indian, or even to a slave who might be employed in our maritime service, and who, though not citizen within the meaning of our Constitution, would, nevertheless, be entitled to our protection whilst engaged in our service.

Recurring again to the nature of the provision in the Constitution, I beg leave to ask, if any instance can be named in which the free negroes and mulattoes have ever been permitted to claim federal rights, or in which the provision has altered or controlled the local authorities over that class of the people? I venture to assert there is none. On the contrary, the States have ever since continued to treat them in all respects as the objects of their municipal power, wholly independent of any federal control, as they did before the Union was formed.

In Connecticut, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Louisiana, Kentucky, Ohio, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, and Alabama, these people are excluded from the right of suffrage, and many civil privileges, to which, in common with aliens, they would have been entitled, but for the municipal regulations. In Pennsylvania they cannot be jurors, their abstract right of voting is illuded, and I have heard it stated that they are not permitted to be educated in public schools with the whites, and are prohibited from keeping public houses, regulations applied to the emigrant negro in common with the native.

Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Ohio, and Illinois, have each passed laws similar to that proposed to be enacted in Missouri. In Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, and Illinois, the laws have been passed since the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. The constitutions of Kentucky, Ohio, Mississippi, Indiana, Illinois, Louisiana, and Alabama, containing these discriminations incorporated in their fundamental policy, have been before Congress, and received their sanction.

In no State in the Union is there any discrimination between the native and emigrant negro. In all of these States the laws have been executed, and, in many, have passed under judicial cognizance, and in none has the right to pass them ever been questioned.

I do not refer to these examples to constitute right out of wrong, but to show the practical exposition which this clause in the Constitution has uniformly received, at all times, and under all circumstances. I ask, sir, if there can possibly be a better or sounder interpretation of the principles of our Constitution than that which has been contemporaneous with the Government, developed by its founders, and practised and acquiesced in by the whole nation from the very foundation of the Government? Sir, I hold that it would be conclusive before any tribunal who could be called upon to adjudge the case. But the doctrine now, for the first time, advocated, and by gentlemen who certainly do not understand our Constitution better than those by whom it was made, and acting under feelings of no ordinary character, denounces all this, and unsettles the established usage and laws of more than half of the States in the Union! Why does Connecticut, in her constitution, made but the other day, prohibit blacks, without distinction, from voting, if the free negroes of New York or Massachusetts may go there and claim all the immunities of citizens, of which the right of suffrage is one? Sir, I desire to be pointed to the State who will consent, upon the arrival of any number of these people from another State, to renounce a course of policy intimately connected with her safety, obliterate from her constitution the feature she most values, and place them upon an equal footing with her white population? In Delaware, we exclude them from voting, they cannot serve on juries, they cannot be witnesses against whites; we have found this policy necessary for our safety; it is rooted in the feelings of the great mass of our population, and in the nature of our institutions, civil and political, and, for one, I will never consent to relinquish it.

Have gentlemen contemplated the consequences that are to flow from the establishment of this doctrine, and are they prepared to brave them? Do they reflect upon the degraded condition in which the state of society has placed these people, and are they willing suddenly to elevate them to the enjoyment of equal civil and political rights? When following in the train of some political zealot, they may become the instruments of the worst ambition. But, sir, will these people wait for the incitement of others? Will they not claim for themselves equal political immunities, by which, however unwilling you may be to give them civil and social privileges, they will wrest them from you. Sir, if the Constitution of the Union ever meant to lead to such consequences, it contains within itself the germ of its own dissolution.

But, Mr. Speaker, one of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) disavows the doctrine in this extent; he claims, indeed, for these people only the humble privilege of setting their feet on the soil. He seems to admit, that after the free negro is in the State, he must be subject to her discriminating policy. In this admission, the gentleman surrenders the whole argument, and betrays the poverty of his case. I have shown you, sir, that the right to emigrate is an incident, and not the principal immunity, and in seeking this privilege, humble as he denominates it, he cannot have it until he establishes his claim to all others. He only can claim to emigrate who is entitled, when he does so, to all the privileges and immunities of a citizen—to those of which the gentleman admits the State may deprive him. Think you, sir, that the Constitution gave the naked right of emigration to be fruitful only of harm? But, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania claims only this humble privilege, is he sure that they for whom he asserts it will be equally modest? Sir, the doctrine once established by the National Legislature, it will be impossible to limit its progress; and the honorable gentleman could not offer a stronger proof of the fallacy of his argument than that, when carried to its legitimate extent; nay, to the only sound basis on which it can rest, if at all, it conducts him to a precipice from which he is obliged to retreat in dismay!

But, Mr. Speaker, if this privilege of setting one's foot on the soil be the only one claimed, it is, indeed, an humble, nay, a miserable one! The privilege of going to a State to be degraded and disfranchised; to be stripped of every civil and political immunity! Who does not see that it puts it into the power of a State to convert into an injury that which was intended for a benefit? If, after these free negroes and mulattoes go to Missouri, the local authorities can render them subordinate to the whites, if they can rightfully exclude them from a participation in all civil and political immunities; and if, in doing so, she indirectly accomplishes the object of her present constitution, consults her own necessities, and imitates the example of her sister States, for what is all this struggle; for what is the Union now shaken to its centre? I ask, again, sir, if such were the privileges and immunities contemplated by the Constitution, or if such a race were ever included within its provisions? How many would go to Missouri upon such terms? How many, I ask, would go there, upon any terms, from those States in which alone it is pretended they can be citizens? And for what and for whom, then, are we contending?

Why shall we force Missouri to adopt a policy which the other States will not practice or acknowledge? Nay, why force upon her an evil which every other State is aiming to shake off? Why compel her to receive a population which cannot assimilate with her citizens; which retard the growth and prosperity of her empire; which are dangerous to her peace, and quiet, and safety, and upon which she must heap odious and continued disabilities, as the lesser evil? It is at most a contest about an abstract right, which can lead to no practical result; for, if the objectionable clause were expunged, the power of the State would remain, and might be exercised in legislative provisions, wholly beyond our control.

Is there any thing, then, sir, in this objection worth the consequences we are hazarding? To speak of nothing more, is it worth the feelings and excitement to which it is likely to give rise here, over the Union, and in Missouri? I fear no violence in Missouri, and if any should exist, I trust it would carry with it its own remedy. But, sir, I fear the weakening of public confidence more than any thing else, by the frequent jarrings and irritation to which this fatal question is likely to expose us. The confidence of the people of this country in the justice and magnanimity of the General Government, as well as in its protection, is the great rock of the Union, and with it must all the foundations of its strength be swept away. I look, also, sir, to the confidence which the people of Missouri should have in the justice of the National Government. Sir, those people must, at some time, and at no distant day, be admitted into this Union. They cannot be kept out, (for I will not yet believe that the present objection is but a pretext, and that when that is removed some new obstacle will be interposed;) and is it not important, sir, that these people should enter the Union, confiding in your justice, and without the remembrance of injury? If it be, of one thing I am certain—that such a temper will not be produced, nor will the public tranquillity be promoted by the fruitless attempt to force the recognition of technical, abstract notions against the uniform sense and practice of the whole community.

When Mr. McLANE had taken his seat—

Mr. MALLARY, of Vermont, observed, that he was conscious of his small claims to the indulgence of the House, while he presented his views on the subject which engaged its attention. He trusted, however, some excuse would be found in the interesting character of the question to be decided.

The measure proposed is calculated to effect the privileges of a part of the people of that section of the Union to which I belong, said Mr. M., and particularly of the State of which I am a Representative. I feel myself under the highest obligation to assert, feebly as it may be, the rights and privileges of those whom the institutions of other States, as well as my own, declare to be their citizens. Such as they recognise as deserving their protecting care, I hope I shall be ever ready and willing to defend.

It has been declared by some one, on the floor of this House, that Missouri was an independent State when she declared it expedient to form a constitution and government. By others it is maintained that she was a State when her convention adopted the constitution which has been presented to us for acceptance. The authority for this is found, it is said, in the first section of the law of the last session of Congress.

The first section declares, that the inhabitants of that portion of Missouri Territory, intended to be formed into a State, are authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government; and said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union. Let us inquire what authority is here conveyed to the people of Missouri, and whether it has been obeyed. By this section the inhabitants of the territory may form a constitution; but they have no power to transfer this authority to others. Nor by this section are any conditions or restrictions required. Did the constitution of Missouri contain no restriction on the sovereign powers of a State? Had its framers refused to secure to the Union its rights to the public lands? would they have found a justification in the section alluded to? Sir, do you there find that Congress demanded of the Territory of Missouri to provide, in her constitution, that the Mississippi and the navigable waters leading into the same, should be common highways, and forever free to the citizens of the United States? And did not her constitution contain such conditions, would this House hesitate a single moment to reject it? I am sure it would not find a single advocate for acceptance. But if Missouri could rely on the first section of that law, all that a sovereign State could claim under the Constitution of the United States, she would have demanded. Congress must have been silent.

Hence, sir, the necessity of recurring to the whole of the law of the last session, and ascertain what are its different provisions. The first section might be considered as a general power, modified by the subsequent requirements of the same law. The whole must be considered as operating together.

The third section declares the qualifications of the inhabitants, who may choose representatives to the convention of Missouri. Those only, whom the law designated, were allowed the right of suffrage. All of the inhabitants were not allowed that privilege. The general right was restricted.

The fourth section prescribes the power of the convention. The convention could determine the question, whether it was expedient to form a constitution. If it decided that it was expedient, the act declared that "the convention shall be, and hereby is, authorized to form a constitution and State government—provided that the same, whenever formed, shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States."

The convention of Missouri, elected pursuant to the third article of the act referred to, proceeded, under the fourth, and adopted the constitution now on your table. Can it be pretended, with a shadow of plausibility, that the convention may accept of what conditions they please and reject such as they dislike? Shall the people of Missouri take all the privileges and advantages to themselves, and trample under foot whatever may be of value to the nation?

Thus, sir, I have endeavored to present the authority given to the people of Missouri to form a constitution. This is clearly and expressly defined. It is under the unqualified condition that whatever constitution they did form, it should be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The declaration of Congress was explicit and decided to the people of Missouri, that if they chose to form such a constitution, they had the power; if they refused to comply, Congress must be absolved from every offer which had been made. If they have failed to fulfil those requirements which were demanded by the sovereign power of this Union, their acts can have no binding obligation. Their constitution is like that of any other people, formed without knowledge or consent of Congress, and entitled to no more indulgence.

It has been maintained on the floor of this House, that Missouri, at the time her convention declared it expedient to form a government, became an independent State. It seems to me, sir, that a moment's reflection will carry conviction to the mind, that this is unconditionally incorrect. I ask, what would have been the condition of Missouri, if the convention, after having decided that it was expedient to form a constitution, should have dissolved without forming one? Would it still remain a State? It may, without hesitation, be asserted, that she would not possess a single feature of a State which belongs to the Union.

Having thus seen the rights and powers conferred by Congress on Missouri; having seen that her privilege depended on the condition, among others, that her constitution should not be repugnant to that of the United States; we have now to ascertain whether her convention has violated that condition.

Is the constitution of Missouri repugnant to the Constitution of the United States?

By the twenty-sixth section of the constitution now offered for our acceptance, it is declared that "it shall be the duty of the General Assembly of Missouri, as soon as may be, to pass such laws, as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in, this State, under any pretext whatsoever." Language, clear, precise, and energetic. It almost seems that it was feared the assembly might be disposed to relax the severity of that inexorable clause. But to prevent the possibility of disobedience, we find, not the common declaration of duty to the assembly, but a rigid admonition, not to disobey under any "pretext whatsoever."

The Constitution of the United States declares that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

Are negroes and mulattoes the citizens of any State. If so, it is clear, that the language which has been repeated from the constitution of Missouri, is a glaring and offending violation of the Constitution of the United States.

An honorable member from Virginia, (Mr. ARNOLD,) has very gallantly avowed himself the champion of State rights. I consider, with him, that it should constitute a crime of the darkest hue to abandon them; but, at the same time, it is a duty of the highest order to preserve from violation those which belong to the Union. Those rights which have not been surrendered by the several States to the General Government still remain in their power. Among these, the right of a State to declare who of its own inhabitants may be its citizens still remains unimpaired. It was never given up; it has been perpetually exercised by every State, as one of its most valuable prerogatives.

We have been asked, if other States are allowed to declare who may be their citizens, shall not Missouri be indulged in the same power? She would be entitled to equal privileges, but no more. The people of that territory may make citizens of whom they please, among themselves. For one, I have little disposition to interfere. But, when they attempt to disfranchise those, who have been made the citizens of other States, it is a matter of very different import. This privilege, instead of reducing Missouri to a state "of pupillage," would elevate her to the rank of mistress of the Union. The other States must then bow in submission to her superior power. Sir, no State in the Union would presume to deprive the citizens of Missouri of their rights, nor will they with composure allow her a prerogative which they disavow for themselves.

A citizen has been defined by a member from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) to be a person who enjoys all the civil rights and privileges which others possess under the same circumstances, belonging to the same community, unless such rights have been forfeited by such person, by some cause existing in himself. Whether the definition is correct or not, it will, I am confident, lead to a conclusion directly the reverse to that which has been drawn by the honorable gentleman who gave it. It admits, that there are different circumstances under which the people of the Union are found. It would be morally and politically impossible that all persons in a State could be found under the same circumstances. Those will be natural or created by the civil and political institutions of society. Yet, it seems to be agreed, that when we find a person, who enjoys all the rights and privileges which others enjoy, under similar circumstances, he is a citizen.

In many, perhaps in all, of the States a distinction is made, for many purposes, between freeholders and those who are not. One may serve as a juror, the other is excluded from that privilege, or right. The freeholder in Vermont may have a certain kind of process without surety; the person who is not a freeholder is deprived of this privilege. No one, however, would presume to declare that a person who was not a freeholder could not be a citizen. Here the rule which has been mentioned would apply correctly. The person who was not a freeholder, but who possessed all the civil rights and privileges which others enjoyed, under the same circumstances, would still be a citizen. So, minority or advanced age would constitute other classes, and having equal rights with their several classes are equally citizens. If property or age are employed by the supreme power of a State to confer different rights on the white population, and yet the character of citizenship remains unchanged, why may not color be employed to distinguish another class? Color may be a circumstance which will designate a portion of population, and may be used constitutionally, as age or property. If it is so, it is a clear conclusion which will follow from the position assumed, that every colored person who is entitled to all the rights and privileges which others enjoy, under the same circumstances, must be a citizen.

A reference has been made to the laws of Massachusetts which prohibit a black man from marrying a white woman. It is said that by the operation of this law he is deprived of a civil right, which renders him unequal to others, and deprives him of citizenship. Had not this doctrine been advanced by those whose talents command respect, it would never require refutation. It may be proper to pursue this principle to its necessary conclusion. It will not be denied that the female part of society are citizens of the several States to which they belong. They have civil rights and privileges, and as citizens can demand the protection and support of Government. But the black man cannot marry a woman of a different color, therefore he is not a citizen, because he is deprived of a right which a white man possesses. The white woman cannot marry a man of a different color—by the same rule, which the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) has laid down, she cannot be a citizen, because she is deprived of a right which a colored woman enjoys. The operation of the law must be reciprocal, and if one class has lost its rights as citizens, the other has also.

It is also said that the negro and mulatto are not enrolled in the militia, and compelled to perform military service. In some States, perhaps in all, they may be exempt. So are those over and under the age prescribed by the laws. Is the youth of sixteen and the man of fifty deprived of the character of citizens because others are called upon to perform more arduous duties than themselves? If this is correct, all who have been excused from these duties are most shamefully degraded. The white and black man must share one common fate.

Thus, sir, I have endeavored to prove that the position which has been assumed will lead to the inevitable conclusion, that negroes and mulattoes, who, in any State, can demand the exercise of civil rights and privileges in common with that class to which they belong, are entitled to the character of citizens.

I concur with others who have addressed the House before me, that the term citizen cannot be defined by a single expression. The rights of citizens are different in different States, and are dependent on the several constitutions and laws which have been adopted. In the same State, different persons may be confined to different rights and yet all be citizens.

I will venture to assume a position, which I am confident none will deny. Not that it will embrace all who are entitled to the rights of citizens, but will be sufficiently comprehensive for the present discussion.

A person must be considered a citizen, who, by the fundamental laws of a State, is invested with political rights. These are the rights which communicate life and give activity to a government itself. In all the States of the Union, these rights are conferred on those only who have bound themselves to the common interest and become pledged to promote the general welfare; who have been incorporated into the great family of the people, and have made one common cause in the pursuit of the great objects of human government.

It would be absurd, sir, to say, that you will allow the enjoyment of the highest prerogatives to a person while he is yet an alien and a stranger; that you will permit a man to exercise those powers on which your Government must depend, and still not be a citizen. What State in the Union permits, for instance, the right of suffrage, but to such as are its citizens? What constitution declares a person eligible to its highest honors, who is deprived of the character of a citizen? It would be fatal to the existence of any government to admit the people of other countries to control its operations, until they had been bound by some strong, indissoluble tie to the general welfare.

In the position which I have assumed, I am well supported by the assertion of the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. SMYTH.) I understood him distinctly to maintain "that a citizen might be defined to be one who is entitled to political rights."

Permit me, sir, to examine whether any negro or mulatto has political rights in any State; whether there is a constitution which decrees to such person all the privileges of citizens. I should never have troubled the House with many observations on this point, had it not been so often asserted, in the most decisive language, that negroes or mulattoes, in every State in the Union, were deprived of all the essential rights of citizens. I should have supposed the most superficial examination of the constitutions of the several States would have proved, that such ideas were utterly destitute of foundation. But they have been advanced on the floor of this House, with such confidence, that I hope I shall be indulged in attempting to correct the error.

Sir, I would call the attention of the House to the constitution of Vermont. There, gentlemen will find an unequivocal declaration "that all men 'are born equally free and independent; that no 'male person, born in this country, or brought from 'over sea, ought to be holden, by law, to serve any 'person as a servant, slave, or apprentice, after he 'arrives at the age of twenty-one years; nor female, in like manner, after she arrives at the age 'of eighteen years.'" It does not declare that all men except negroes and mulattoes "are born equally free and independent;" it does not declare, Mr. Speaker, that no person except negroes and mulattoes shall be holden to servitude. The language is broad and comprehensive as the race of man. And, I believe that those unfortunate beings, even where they are held in a state of the deepest degradation, are still considered as belonging to the human family.

Sir, lest this may be called an unmeaning manifesto of the rights of man, calculated for a splendid show of republicanism, but intended to confer no substantial benefits, I will again refer to that instrument. "The declaration of the political rights 'and privileges of the inhabitants of this State is 'hereby declared to be a part of the constitution of 'this Commonwealth, and ought not to be violated 'on any pretence whatsoever.'" Negroes and mulattoes, sir, here find protection under this firm, humane and liberal provision; to which the people of Vermont look with the proudest satisfaction, as their common safeguard.

DECEMBER, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Again, sir, it is declared "that every man of the full age of twenty-one years, having resided in this State for the space of one year next before the election of representatives, and is of a peaceable or quiet behaviour, and will take the following oath, [the oath of allegiance to the State] shall be entitled to all the privileges of a freeman of this State." This does not say, every man, except negroes and mulattoes. It embraces all of every color, whether "born in this country or brought from over sea;" and permit me to say that the rights of a freeman confer the highest distinction that can be given to an inhabitant of that State; they imply the perfection of all the civil and political privileges and immunities that can be enjoyed by man in the society of his fellow men. All the security which the Constitution gives to the most distinguished citizen for the protection of his life and reputation, is afforded to every freeman, whatever may be his circumstances or color. The spirit of the Constitution watches with equal eye over the rights and privileges, civil and political, of the negro and mulatto, and would chastise the least attempt to offer violation.

Here, sir, I might rest in the fullest confidence, that the position which has been assumed was fully supported. But the assertion has been so often and so emphatically made, that those people who are dreaded by the convention of Missouri are not the citizens of any State, a reference must be made to the constitutions of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and New York. Not one withholds its political and civil rights, but confers them with indiscriminate liberality, without distinction of color. The light or shade of a countenance, which indicates an alliance with the great family of man, confers no exclusive privileges on the possessors, nor do they blot from a political charter the immunities of citizens. In those States you may see that class, who are prescribed by the constitution of Missouri, in the full enjoyment of those privileges which are the distinguishing prerogatives of freemen.

Sir, I will call the attention of gentlemen to some of the many attempts that have been made to remove the objections which may exist against the offered constitution. It is said that the objectionable clause may be construed so as to operate on none who are the citizens of a State. It is also contended that we should presume the people of Missouri would carry it into execution in a manner compatible with the Constitution of the United States. Sir, there can be nothing left to such a presumption. If the object was not to exclude citizens as well as others, why did the convention not condescend to make some exception? Not only did they use the language of imperative authority, but forbid a deviation for "any pretext whatsoever." I do not pretend to say that the framers of that constitution supposed they adopted provisions incompatible with the supreme law of the land. Such a conclusion would be a charge of deliberate violation. When they find themselves supported on the floor of this House by gentlemen distinguished for talents and a knowledge of our political institutions, can we suppose they will readily change their opinion? It will tend to confirmation, and we may presume the slaveholding policy will demand its execution with the most energetic determination.

It has been maintained in debate that this clause is not a violation of the Constitution of the United States; that the constitution of Missouri does not contain a prohibition in itself, but requires the Assembly to pass such laws as will accomplish the object desired. We are called upon to wait, and if such laws should be passed, their binding power may be tried. The force of this distinction has escaped my discernment. Can it be said, with propriety, that an act performed is illegal, and the authority by which it is done unimpeachable? Is it correct for a constitution to direct an Assembly, dependent on its power, to pass a law which, from the first moment of its existence, would be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States? You might as well command your servant to assassinate your neighbor, and have the illegality of your command depend upon its execution.

But, allowing the constitution of Missouri is not a violation of that of the United States; that the direction to the Assembly to perform what is declared to be their duty, is no offence, it would not diminish the objection. When Government have the power, it is bound to prevent an outrage on its dignity, as it is to punish one after it is committed. You may as well pull down the edifice yourself as to give the power to others.

Sir, we have been told that the several States, among other legitimate powers, may exercise such as are deemed necessary for their own defence and safety; that they may exclude from their jurisdiction those objects which are in themselves odious and pernicious. It is said, upon this principle, States have the power, and often exercise it, in the establishment of those quarantine regulations by which the citizens of other States are excluded, to prevent plague and pestilence.

If these principles be established, and are applicable to the question now to be decided by the House, consider, sir, the consequences which must inevitably follow. Every object which the people of a State may consider odious and pernicious may be excluded by their own authority. If they are uncontrolled by any rule but their own views of propriety or interest, the exercise of that authority may be unbounded as the objects of their displeasure may be numerous. It will follow, that the sovereign power of Missouri may exclude free negroes and mulattoes, because they are considered odious and pernicious. They may be considered dangerous as "plague and pestilence," and placed under eternal "quarantine." If Missouri can exercise this power against that class of citizens, she can extend it to every other. In the estimation of her people, the white citizens of the non-slaveholding States may be both pernicious and odious, and a prohibitory mandate be issued to exclude them from her soil.

Fatal, indeed, must this doctrine be to the rights of citizens. Establish the principle that every State may exclude the object which it happens to dislike, and the Constitution is annihilated. We have no security for those rights which alone can sustain a national character. We must be confined to that territory which we may call our State, and, if we venture abroad into another, we must be looked upon as strangers and aliens.

H. OF R.

Admission of Missouri.

Another observation fell from an honorable member in debate, which deserves an answer. It was said, those whom the constitution of Missouri will exclude, never have enjoyed any civil or political rights, except what the Legislatures of the States in which they reside may have gratuitously given. This, sir, is a very serious mistake. The people to whom we allude were among the earliest inhabitants of several States. In Vermont they were received and acknowledged as citizens when the constitution was formed, under which the rights and privileges of every citizen are protected. The Legislature could as easily demolish the constitution itself as take from a colored citizen a single right which it has declared to be sacred. The declaration, "that all men are born equally free;" "that no person brought from over sea" should be held to servitude, may be called a gratuity, if gentlemen please; but, sir, the people of Vermont consider it a gratuity from Heaven. The colored man was distinctly in the view of the framers of that constitution. Whether born in the United States, or "brought over sea," he was an equal object of regard and protection. Such is the condition, in Vermont, of those whom Missouri forbids to set a foot upon her soil.

Again, we are told but few of this description of citizens would ever migrate to Missouri. The same might be said of the whole people of a State. Should a State of the Union become obnoxious and odious to the people of a Territory, they might, under the precedent that may be established, exclude its citizens in general "from coming to, or setting in," the same, "under any pretext whatsoever." If, then, we are presented with an assumption of unconstitutional power, it ought to be arrested on its first appearance. Indulgence would give it confidence, and suffering it to pass for a while unregarded would render it unconquerable.

It seems to me, therefore, that I am justified in drawing the conclusion that negroes and mulattoes are citizens of several States in this Union; that they are entitled to the privileges and immunities of citizens in every State; that the attempt of Missouri to repel them from her limits, is repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, and that she ought not to be received as a member of this Confederacy.

When Mr. M. had concluded—

Mr. EUSTIS, of Massachusetts, addressed the House, in substance, as follows:

I am one of those who had hoped that the discussion of this question might have been avoided. But it is upon us, and we must meet and decide it. With gentlemen who have preceded me, I perfectly agree, that the only question to be determined is, whether that article in the constitution of Missouri, making it the duty of the Legislature to provide by law "that free negroes and mulattoes shall not be admitted into that State," is, or is not, repugnant to that clause in the Constitution of the United States, which declares "that the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." This question has been fairly met. Those who contend that the article is not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States, ground themselves on the position that blacks and mulattoes are not citizens of the United States, and have repeatedly referred to the condition of those in Massachusetts to support the assertion. Now, sir, I invite the honorable member from Delaware, who has lately addressed you, with the honorable member from Virginia, who, in his address to the Committee of the Whole, on Friday last, maintained the same position, to go with me and examine the question to its root.

At the commencement of the Revolutionary war, there were found in the Middle and Northern States, many blacks and other people of color, capable of bearing arms; a part of them free, the greater part slaves. The freemen entered our ranks with the whites. The time of those who were slaves was purchased by the States, and they were induced to enter the service in consequence of a law by which, on condition of their serving in the ranks during the war, they were made freemen. In Rhode Island, where their numbers were more considerable, they were formed, under the same considerations, into a regiment commanded by white officers; and it is required, in justice to them, to add, that they discharged their duty with zeal and fidelity. The gallant defence of Red Bank, in which this black regiment bore a part, is among the proofs of their valor.

Among the traits which distinguished this regiment, was their devotion to their officers; when their brave Colonel Greene was afterwards cut down and mortally wounded, the sabres of the enemy reached his body only through the limbs of his faithful guard of blacks, who hovered over him and protected him, every one of whom was killed, and whom he was not ashamed to call his children. The services of this description of men in the navy are also well known. I should not have mentioned either, but for the information of the gentleman from Delaware, whom I understood to say that he did not know that they had served in any considerable numbers.

The war over and peace restored, these men returned to their respective States. And who could have said to them, on their return to civil life after having shed their blood, in common with the whites, in the defence of the liberties of the country, You are not to participate in the rights secured by the struggle, or in the liberty for which you have been fighting? Certainly, no white man in Massachusetts.

The gentleman from Virginia says he must not be told that the term, we the people, in the preamble to the Constitution, means, or includes, Indians, free negroes, mulattoes. If it shall be made to appear that persons of this description, citizens at the time, were parties to, and formed an integral part of that compact, it follows, incontestably, that they are and must be included in it. To justify the inference of gentlemen, the preamble ought to read, We the white people. This was impossible; the members of the convention who formed that constitution, from the Middle and Northern States, could never have consented, knowing that there were in those States many thousands of people of color, who had rights under it. They were free—free from their masters? Yes, in the first instance; they also became freemen of the State, and were admitted to all the rights and privileges of white citizens. Was this admission merely nominal? This is answered by the fact that they did enjoy and did exercise the rights of free citizens, and have continued to exercise them, from the peace of 1783 to this day. It has been contended that they are not citizens, because they have been deprived, by a law of Massachusetts, of a part of their civil rights, and in proof, is stated the law forbidding the marriage of a black man with a white woman. The same law, sir, interdicts the marriage of a white man with a black woman. The law, then, applies equally to both, and cannot justify the inference which has been drawn from it. But, if the black man ceased to be a citizen because he had lost this civil right, as contended for by the gentleman from Virginia, the white man also must be determined not to be a citizen, and the State of Missouri would have an equal right to exclude him. Again, sir, the exclusion of the blacks from the ranks of the militia is adduced as another instance of their privation of a civil right. Without dwelling on the well-known fact that militia duty in Massachusetts is a heavy duty, an exemption from which is considered a favor, and that several other descriptions of citizens are also exempted; and admitting that the blacks are interdicted, while others are only exempted from this duty, what is proved by quoting these laws? They prove that they were in the actual enjoyment of these rights, and that a specific law became necessary to deprive them of them. Admitting that the State had a right to pass these laws, and that this description of citizens are curtailed in their exercise of a part of their privileges, what rights are left to them, and what rights do they continue to enjoy and exercise? We answer, all the broad and essential rights of citizens—the right, in common with the whites, to hold real and personal estate; the right of course to hold and convey land; the right of trial by jury; the right to the writ of habeas corpus; and, in this Government, the all-important right of the elective franchise; and it may be safely affirmed, that, by the laws and constitution of Massachusetts, they are considered as citizens equally with the whites.

It has been justly observed on this subject, by a gentleman on the other side, that facts and practice are better than theory. Here, then, we offer incontrovertible facts, proving, not from theory, but from actual and long continued practice, that black men and mulattoes, in Massachusetts at least, are citizens, having civil and political rights, in common with the whites. If we are asked for evidence of their being in the exercise of these rights, it is answered, that a knowledge of the history and practice of the State for more than forty years past, will show that they have been in the constant exercise of them. To vote in the election of town, county, and State officers, the same qualifications of residence and property are required from them, as from the whites, and, having these qualifications, they have a voice in the election of all State officers. Again, it is particularly affirmed, by the honorable member from Delaware, that this description of persons, whatever right they may have in the several States, have no federal rights, and cannot be considered as citizens of the United States. I had thought, with the honorable member from Pennsylvania, that the question "who were citizens?" was merged and decided by the adoption of the Federal Constitution.

By whom, and for whose use and benefit, was that Constitution formed? By the people, and for the people, inhabiting the several States. Did the Convention who formed it go into the consideration of the character or complexion of the citizens included in the compact? No, sir; they necessarily considered all those as citizens who were acknowledged as such at the time by the constitutions of the States.

Independent of all reasoning, presumption, or theory, we proceed to state facts which prove incontrovertibly their federal rights. I confine my observations to Massachusetts, because the practice in that State is within my own personal knowledge and observation. In that State, sir, the citizens in question constituted, and were in fact an elementary part of the Federal compact. They were as directly represented as the whites, in the initiatory process; and, from their votes, in common with those of the whites, emanated the convention of Massachusetts, by whom the Federal Constitution was received and ratified. Is not this proof? Is it not demonstration that they are entitled to, that they hold and exercise federal rights in common with the other citizens? If a doubt remained, it is answered by another equally important fact. They are also represented, not circuitously and indirectly, but directly, in this House. I very much doubt, sir, if there be a member on this floor from any one district in Massachusetts, whose election does not partake of the votes of these people. In the district which I have the honor to represent, their number, compared with that of the white population, is not great; but, in an adjoining district, their number of qualified voters have been sufficient, and has actually turned the election of a member of this House.

After affirming that they had not the rights of citizens of the United States, which we apprehend we have disproved, the gentleman from Delaware presumes that they are few in number. This also is a great error. Their number is much greater than that gentleman apprehends. Not only the number and the rights of these men, but their characters also, do not appear to have been understood. Nor is it to me at all extraordinary that gentlemen from other States, in which the condition, character, the moral faculties, and the rights of men of color differ so widely, should entertain opinions so variant from ours. In Massachusetts, sir, there are among them those who possess all the virtues which are deemed estimable in civil and social life. They have their public teachers of religion and morality, their schools and other institutions; on anniversaries which they consider interesting to them they have their public processions; in all which they conduct themselves with order and decorum. Do we ask for them any enlargement or extension of their rights? No, sir, we ask only that, in a disposition to accommodate Missouri, their avowed rights and privileges be not taken from them.

If their number be small, and they are feebly represented, we to whom they are known are proportionably bound to protect them. But their defence is not founded on their numbers; it rests on the immutable principles of justice. If there be only one family, or a solitary individual, who has rights guarantied to him by the Constitution, whatever may be his color or complexion, it is not in the power nor can it be in the inclination of Congress to deprive him of them; and I trust, sir, that the decision on this occasion will show that we will extend good faith even to the blacks.

It has been said that an adoption on the part of Congress of the constitution of Missouri gives no additional force to the clause which we think we have shown to be unconstitutional, and that Missouri would have the right to pass the law without the injunction in her constitution; and, further, that her Legislature may or may not exercise the power given to them by her constitution; and, if she should pass an unconstitutional law, a remedy may be had by an appeal to the Judiciary.

Can language be stronger than that made use of in her constitution? "It shall be the duty of the Legislature to pass the law," &c. The Legislature, under that clause, must and will pass the law. The sanction of Congress will give additional force to its injunction, and the black citizen will then be shut out from the State. Where, then, is he to find his remedy?

That Missouri may pass such a law after her admission into the Union is conceded. Such law will not, in that case, be sanctioned by Congress. And, sir, I make a wide distinction between a law passed by a State making a part of the Union, and a provision in the constitution of a State in process of admission into the Union, and presented to Congress for approbation. The right of Congress to admit States into the Union has appeared to me to be in the nature of a sovereign power, over which no co-ordinate branch of the Government can have control; and, disguise it as we may, the admission of Missouri, with this article in her constitution, sanctions that article, and virtually at least declares it not to be repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. To those who believe it to be unconstitutional it is no satisfaction to be told that the Judiciary will correct their error. They consider it their duty to make a right decision, presuming that there will be no appeal.

Mr. Speaker, no one can address you who is more sensible than I am that this Government is the result of compromise; of a healing, heavenly, conciliating spirit, which the genius of the immortal Washington was perhaps alone capable of rallying round him; nor can any one be more sensible of the importance of cherishing these dispositions, more especially in cases where the rights of States, whether already admitted, or hereafter to be admitted into the Union, are concerned. Let us be careful that this indulgent disposition be not extended too far. Sir, this has been considered a sectional question. I must deny the position. Maine is as deeply interested in it as Missouri. In every question touching the Constitution every State in the Union has an equal, a common interest; and, let me add, however we may differ in opinion or in construction, we are bound by a common interest to extend to each other the belief that there is a common respect and an equal desire to obey its injunctions. Were this even a doubtful case, it ought to be decided in favor of common rights. Were it possible that, in the wish to accommodate Missouri, the Constitution should be made to bend in her favor, the tree is in danger, and, if a single limb be broken, Missouri is no longer safe in what would be guarantied to her. In less than twelve months the inclination may be in a different direction, and she may lose more than she would have gained.

Among the different arguments which have been made use of, I have regretted that allusions have been had to consequences which may result from a negative on the resolution under consideration. Sir, perfectly sensible of the delicate situation in which Missouri will be placed, I exclude from my own mind all considerations of this kind, from a conviction that no consequences can or will arise which ought to be compared, or put in competition, with those resulting necessarily from a violation of the compact which binds us together as a nation.

When Mr. E. had concluded—

The Committee rose, on the motion of Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, (some other gentlemen also rising to obtain the floor,) and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 13.

Another member, to wit: from North Carolina, THOMAS SETTLE, appeared, and took his seat.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, on the part of the stockholders of the said bank, praying for an amendment in that part of the charter of said bank which provides that no director, except the president, shall be eligible for more than three years in four; that provision may be made for the punishment of such officers of the bank as may be guilty of fraud, speculation, or violation of the trust committed to them; that authority may be vested in the said president and directors, to employ persons to sign and counter-sign the notes of the bank; and that the bills or notes originally made payable, or which shall have become payable on demand, shall of right be received and payable only at the bank or branch of the bank, at which the same purports to be payable; which memorial was referred to a select committee, and Messrs. SERGEANT, WHITMAN, TYLER, GORHAM, and HARDIN, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a memorial of the merchants, agriculturists, and other inhabitants of the town of Fredericksburg, and the adjacent county, in the State of Virginia, praying that the commerce of the country may not be fettered or impeded by any increase of the tariff of duties on imports, for the purpose of affording further protection to the manufacturing interest of the country.

Mr. JONES, of Virginia, presented a memorial of the merchants and other inhabitants of the town of Petersburg, in that State, in opposition to any change in the boundaries of the collection district of Petersburg.—The said memorials were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES also presented a petition of the delegates of the United Agricultural Societies of Prince George, Sussex, Surry, Petersburg, Brunswick, Dinwiddie, and Isle of Wight, in the State of Virginia, praying that the tariff of duties on imports may not be increased for the purpose of affording further protection to the manufacturing interests of the country; which petition was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. BREVARD presented sundry resolutions adopted at a numerous and respectable meeting of the inhabitants of Kershaw district, held at Camden, in the State of South Carolina, on the 4th of November last, expressive of their disapprobation of any increase of the tariff of duties on imports.

Mr. WHITMAN presented a memorial from a convention of delegates assembled from the agricultural and commercial sections of the State of Maine, in relation to the tariff proposed at the last session of Congress, and praying that no such measure may be adopted at the present session.—The said resolutions and memorial were referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

The bills from the Senate for the relief of John Holmes, of Alabama, and for the relief of Morgan Brown, were twice read and considered.

The resolution from the Senate, "declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union," was read the first time, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. RICH, the House proceeded to consider the proposition submitted by him yesterday, to amend the standing rules and orders of the House; and the said proposition being again read, was agreed to by the House.

Mr. TRACY submitted the following resolution, which was read, and ordered to lie on the table one day for consideration, viz:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to lay before this House a list of all the lands and buildings which have been purchased by the United States for military purposes, from the 1st day of July, 1812, to the present time; the cost of each site, and of the buildings, as far as may be practicable; together with the estimated present value; also indicating those which, in the judgment of the Secretary, may be sold without injury to the public service.

16th CON. 2d SESS.—21

OFFICES OF THE CUSTOMS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th of May, 1820, a list of the offices of the customs, which may be abolished without detriment to the public interest; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 9, 1820.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 15th of May, 1820, directing the Secretary of the Treasury "to report to the House, at the next session of Congress, such offices of the customs as may be properly suppressed, on account of their inutility, or from any other cause," I have the honor to report a list of offices which it is believed may be abolished without detriment to the public interest.

The information upon which this report is founded, was submitted to the Senate of the United States on the 2d day of December, 1818, with the list hereto annexed, in conformity with a resolution of that honorable House, and may be referred to No. 27 of the reports of the second session of the fifteenth Congress.

In the collection of the revenue persons are employed to weigh, measure, gauge, and mark, all merchandise imported into the United States susceptible of these different operations, the fees for which are defined by law, and form a large item in the expenses of collection.

It is ascertained that for these services there was paid during the year 1819 the sum of $116,426 71. It is also ascertained that, in one of the principal ports, these services are performed exclusively by the inspectors, who receive three dollars a day throughout the year, for their services as inspectors. The law regulating the compensation of the inspectors of the customs, authorizes the allowance of three dollars a day for the days that they are actually employed. But they cannot be considered as actually employed as inspectors every day in the year, when during the same time they are employed as weighers, measurers, gaugers, and markers, and actually receive for such services about $2,400 a year.

In several of the ports, the inspectors have voluntarily offered to perform, without compensation, such services. It is confidently believed that the inspectors employed in the several districts of the United States, at this time, are entirely competent to discharge these duties, in addition to those now required of them. The abolition of the fees for weighing, measuring, gauging, and marking, will reduce the expenses of collection at least $100,000 a year, whilst the abolition of the offices presented in the list annexed to this report will not reduce it to more than about $8,000. It is, therefore, respectfully submitted, that it is expedient to repeal so much of the second section of the act to establish the compensation of the officers employed in the collection of the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes, passed March the 2d, 1799; and of all other acts which allow fees for weighing, measuring, gauging, and marking of merchandise or packages, imported into the United States, and that these services be rendered by the inspectors of the customs.

I remain, with respect, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The Hon. J. W. TAYLOR,
Speaker House of Representatives.

CONSTITUTION OF MISSOURI.

The House then resumed the consideration of the resolution declaring the admission of the State of Missouri into the Union.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, delivered, at considerable length, his sentiments, in opposition to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. COOK, of Illinois, said, after the full discussion which this subject had already received, he felt much reluctance in asking the attention of the House to a single additional remark from him; and were it not for the peculiar situation in which he found himself placed, he should have been contented in giving a silent vote. He said he had fully given his constituents to understand that he should vote for the admission of Missouri. That he had given them so to understand, even previous to his re-election to a seat in the next Congress, and the result of that election had satisfied him that his vote would not be disapproved. He considered the faith of Congress pledged, by the act of the last session, to admit her, provided her constitution were made in conformity to the terms of this act, and when he had said he would vote for her admission, that declaration had always been made under the belief that such would be the case.

When Mr. C. arrived at Washington, he for the first time met the objection, which was now urged against her constitution, and perhaps under the influence of a strong anxiety for her admission, had examined the question, as he then thought, thoroughly, and for a considerable time saw no reason to change his determination. Under this conviction, produced by that examination, he had, as he hoped he always should do, fearlessly expressed his opinion in favor of her admission. He even now, notwithstanding his opinion was changed, freely declared that all his predilections were in favor of such a vote. Missouri, he said, was the near adjoining neighbor of Illinois, and notwithstanding an unhappy difference of opinion upon political subjects had created between their respective citizens a rancor and animosity, which he well knew the vote he was about to give would not in the least allay; a vote which he well knew many of his constituents would be greatly disappointed when they heard of; yet he should be glad to see her admitted and placed upon an equal footing with the State which he had the honor to represent.

Mr. C. said, it was because of his particular situation, and because there was a view of the subject which had weight with him, and which had not been taken in argument, that he ventured to beg the indulgence of the House for a single moment.

He was aware that the change his opinion had undergone, had called forth the charge of inconsistency and timidity from some, on both sides of the question. But such suggestions made no impression upon his mind. He felt shielded against the effects of all such unkind opinions and suggestions, by a consciousness of the rectitude of his own motives.

He said he considered the freedom of thought, and its fearless declaration, as the palladium of truth, and the impregnable bulwark of liberty. When reason was left free to combat error, the triumph of sound principles, he thought, could not long be doubtful.

Under the influence of these sentiments he had examined the subject for himself, and had satisfied his own mind of the incorrectness of his first opinion. And surely after the example set him by the distinguished chairman of the committee who reported this resolution, (Mr. LOWNDES,) he hoped he might escape animadversion for acknowledging his error. He said that honorable gentleman had frankly and magnanimously acknowledged his error in reporting that preamble to the resolution then under discussion, which had been stricken out. An example of this kind he was by no means ashamed to imitate.

Mr. C. said, much argument had been employed on the opposite side, to prove that Missouri was now a State. In reply to which he had no hope of being able to advance stronger arguments than had already been urged, and particularly by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (Mr. SERGEANT,) and he was therefore willing to adopt them as the arguments upon which he predicated the converse of that proposition, that Missouri was not now a State, unless she were such de facto, and therefore entitled to none of the rights and immunities of a State of this Union.

In order to be a State of this Union, or to be entitled to become such, he considered it an indispensable prerequisite, on her part, to form a constitution in conformity to the principles of the Federal Constitution, and in conformity to the conditions presented by the act by virtue of which her constitution, upon its face, professed to have been formed.

That she had not framed such a constitution, he thought was fairly deducible from the arguments which he was about to employ. The Constitution of the United States, said he, gives to "Congress the power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." This, said Mr. C., is a general power, and in the exercise of this general power he apprehended Congress had a right to dispose of that territory to whomsoever they pleased. He said it had been admitted by gentlemen on both sides of this question, that free negroes and mulattoes were competent to hold real estate, and that they did hold it in almost, if not quite every State in the Union. They are therefore competent, he observed, under the admission of all parties, to purchase such estate from the United States. But the constitution of Missouri declares, "that it shall be the duty of the Legislature, as soon as may be, to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to, and settling in that State, under any pretext whatsoever." A provision, said he, which, notwithstanding their competency to purchase, and the indisputable power of Congress to sell to them, clearly asserts a controlling power both over the rights of these individuals, and the paramount authority of Congress.

DECEMBER, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Sir, said he, every Congress is equal, and is therefore alike possessed of power to dispose of the territory of the United States, as may be thought expedient. One Congress cannot irrevocably declare that no subsequent Congress shall sell any portion of the public domain to free negroes or mulattoes; the attempt to do so, would be vain and nugatory. If Congress, then, cannot do this, can they, asked Mr. C., confer this power upon a subordinate Legislature? Surely not. It would be making the creature greater than the creator. And yet Missouri does virtually declare, by prohibiting their emigration thither, that hereafter the United States shall not sell any of the public domain within her borders to persons of that description. In doing this he thought Missouri had attempted more than Congress could do, and, he thought, had therefore violated the Federal Constitution. But, said Mr. C., there is another view of this question, which it may not be amiss to present.

The gentleman from Delaware (Mr. McLANE) had contended that the Legislature of Missouri would have this power, even if their constitution did not expressly confer it. These people, said that gentleman, are not citizens, and may therefore be kept out. Now, if, because they are not citizens, they may be kept out, with equal reason at least may Indians, and all other aliens be also kept out. And yet, said he, we know the Government is in the constant habit of ceding to the Indians portions of the national domain, in exchange for portions of theirs. If the argument of the gentleman, therefore, proved any thing, it clearly proved too much. It is true, said Mr. C., that clause of the constitution does not give the Legislature this excluding power, in relation to Indians or aliens, but it gives a power which, if sanctioned, does by analogy sanction the doctrine of that gentleman; and, by denying the right of the Legislature to exercise this express power, we necessarily deny its right to exercise the implied.

For one, Mr. C. would be extremely glad if the State had this excluding power in relation to Indians. They are a troublesome population, and the State which he had the honor to represent might finally, for the want of such power, find herself encumbered by the settlement of additional tribes within her borders; an event by no means desirable.

While upon this branch of the subject, Mr. C. hoped he would be pardoned for a moment's digression from the question immediately before the House. He said that the correctness of the authority which the treaty-making power had been heretofore exercising, in disposing of the territory of the United States by cession to the Indians, he thought, deserved a serious examination. He had been impressed with the idea, that the express delegation of the power to dispose of the territory of the United States to Congress, ought to exclude the idea of the existence of a similar power, and particularly by implication, in any other department of the Government. He said it was true, that the unfixed lines of, and disputed title to, any portion of territory, could only be settled by treaty; and, in the case of war, where the cession of a portion of territory was made a sine qua non to the restoration of peace; this being a case of necessity, he supposed it would also be competent for the treaty-making power to make the demanded cession. But, when the indisputable title was vested in the United States, and no such necessity existed, he thought it worthy of the profoundest inquiry to determine what were the limits of the treaty-making power upon the subject.

Mr. C. said, there was another view of that clause of the Missouri constitution, under which it seemed still more obviously in violation of the Federal Constitution. Congress, he said, by virtue of the general power which it possessed to dispose of the territory of the United States, for the purpose of obtaining the military services of persons, as well of this as of every other description, had offered them a land bounty, to many of whom, and embracing free negroes and mulattoes, patents had already been issued for lands in Missouri. He said persons of this description, to his own knowledge, had purchased land in Illinois, and he had no doubt they had also in Missouri. Whether they had or not, however, did not vary the case—the principle was the same. In the soldier as well as the purchaser, therefore, he, Mr. C., begged leave to say, the Government of the United States vested a fee simple estate in those lands. The Government, he said, made no other description of title. This title he considered to consist of the possession, the right of possession, and the right of property; and he thought, when he asserted that the Government had guaranteed all these features of the right which it vested, both to the soldier and the purchaser, that no honorable member would hazard a controversion of that assertion. Under this guarantee he considered the United States incompetent, unless for public purposes, and then only by paying a fair equivalent therefor, to deprive them of this property; and yet Missouri, a subordinate Legislature, if her constitution be allowed to operate, does virtually take it away, without paying any equivalent whatever; for, if a person be not allowed to enjoy the possession of his property, he is virtually deprived of it.

But, said he, the United States are bound both to the soldier and the purchaser to protect him in the enjoyment of his property; it constitutes, by every principle of law and reason, a part of the original contract. The Government, for this obligation, has received a full consideration, and yet Missouri, in direct violation of that provision of the Federal Constitution which forbids any State to pass any "ex post facto law, or law impairing the obligation of contracts" has virtually provided that those contracts which have been completed by the emanation of patents shall, by the ex post facto operation of her constitution, be annulled, and the force of the contract be wholly impaired; and by its prospective operation as virtually impairs the obligation of those contracts, which are yet executory for the want of patents.

Mr. C. said he had, at the last session of Congress, when discussing the question of restriction, stated that new States, when admitted into the Union, could not, under his view of the subject, come in, and be upon an equal footing, in their domestic aspect, with the original States. He then attempted to prove it, by showing that a proposition was made in the Federal Convention to ingraft this provision into the Constitution: "That new States, when admitted into this Union, shall be upon an equal footing with the original States." This provision, said Mr. C., partly for the reasons which he then urged, as well as for many others equally cogent, was rejected. One other of these reasons now presented itself, and was indeed the basis upon which all others rested. It was that, the full operation of which, he had endeavored to show the Missouri constitution attempted to arrest. It was, that the Federal Government had sovereign authority over the public soil within the confines of such new States. The old States were lords of their own soil, the new are not. In the domestic aspect, therefore, the old and new States are not, nor can they be, upon an equal footing. In their federal aspect, however, he admitted their perfect equality; he meant in the enjoyment of rights exclusively federal.

Mr. C. said it would at once be seen that the force of his objection did not connect itself with the great question of citizenship, but was an objection looking to other clauses of the Constitution. That those clauses were impugned by the clause in the Missouri constitution to which he had referred, was apparent at least to his mind, and he could not therefore vote for the resolution now under consideration.

But, he said, it had been proposed to refer this question to the Judiciary. The propriety of that proposition he should not attempt to discuss.

He, however, considered it a question growing out of the exercise of a power vested exclusively in Congress—the power to admit new States; and was therefore a question which he thought Congress bound to determine. He was not over anxious to assume responsibility, but he certainly felt no disposition to shrink from that which he thought properly devolved upon him.

Mr. C. again repeated, that his feelings were in favor of admission; that both personal and political reasons combined to render it a desirable event; and were it consistent with his sense of the duty which he owed to the country and the Constitution to give such a vote upon the resolution under consideration, he was sure no member on that floor would do it with more pleasure. But, while he considered the Constitution the rock upon which our temple of liberty must stand, and having sworn to support it, he felt himself called upon to forego all such considerations, and defend it against infringement. Sir, said he, if we ever suffer our individual feelings and wishes to enter into our deliberations and discussions, so far as to govern our public conduct, those feelings and wishes, like the imperceptible rising of the tide, will finally overrun every principle of the Constitution, and we shall ultimately find ourselves floating at large upon the open sea of uncertainty, without a single landmark to guide us.

The momentary inconvenience even of the nation, and much less of a small portion of it only, should not sanction the least possible violation of that instrument. The progress of despotism upon liberty, he said, was gradual, it kept pace with the loss of public morals. It would be so with encroachments upon the Constitution; they would be so gradual as hardly to be seen or felt, until it was pared down to a state of inefficiency inadequate to the purposes of its adoption; and then, and not till then, would the Government be dissolved. The line between the Federal and State Governments should be fixed, and encroachments upon either should be resisted in the bud. However anxious, therefore, he might be for the admission of Missouri, he could not, for one, consent to receive her with this clause in her constitution.

When Mr. Cook had concluded, Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, addressed the Chair in substance as follows:

Mr. LOWNDES began by saying that he did not remember having ever before addressed the House twice on the same proposition. It was perhaps his duty, as chairman of the committee which had reported the resolution upon the table, to reply to the objections which had been made to their report. But he had another, though a personal, motive. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) had peremptorily denied facts of which he had given the proof at the same time with the assertion; he had forgotten, and in consequence misquoted, the words of the resolution reported by the committee to which they both belonged, and from the beginning to the end of his speech had, with few exceptions, eluded every argument which he professed to answer.

The question on which they differed most essentially was that which regarded the effect and obligation of that law of the last session, by which the people of Missouri were authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government. Mr. L. believed that under this law it was not left to our discretion to determine whether she should become a member of the Confederacy, but that upon her accepting the terms which were proposed in it, upon her engaging to fulfil the duties of a State, she had acquired its rights, and that Congress had become bound to take every measure which might be necessary for their recognition and exercise.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had met one of the principles on which this proposition might be supposed to depend. He had denied that Congress had power to pass an act for the admission of a State, which should take effect from a future day.

The Constitution gives to Congress the power to admit States in the broadest terms. The high privileges which it is authorized to impart may commence instantly, and extend through all future time. When the convenience of a Territory required that it should become a member of the Union at a future day, what principle of the Constitution was opposed to this prospective admission? Congress may raise armies. Has any man ever suspected that this power could not be executed by giving a prospective and even a contingent authority? Congress may lay taxes. May they not be limited to take effect some time after the passage of the law? Congress may constitute inferior courts. Would such an act be void, because its operation was to commence from a future day? Void because it was not inconvenient and absurd? Run your eye along the whole list of powers which are given to the Federal Legislature, and you will find no countenance for the doctrine which would require that at the very moment when their will is pronounced, the object which they are empowered to effect, should be instantly executed. The power of making treaties, too, although given to another depository, is supposed to be pursued, although the convention with a foreign State may take effect from a future day. There is nothing plausible in the assertion which denies to Congress the power of admitting States, by an act which shall not go into operation for some time after its passage. The House would see in his subsequent observations the importance of determining whether Congress had the Constitutional right of admitting States by a prospective law. He need not say that this question of right was distinct from that of expediency.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

Mr. L. conceived this to be the doctrine of the friends of the resolution, that when any people, subject to the authority of the United States, from the extent of their territory, their numbers, the habits and character of their society, seem capable of self-government, the control which Congress had reserved over their appointments and laws shall be withdrawn; they shall be authorized to form and administer their own constitution, and shall participate as an equal member of the Union, in all its privileges and powers. It is an act of emancipation. But the restraints as well as the advantages of the Federal Constitution are extended to them. What security, it is asked, do you take, that these restraints will be submitted to? We trust the people with their own constitution. We believe that Missouri, as we believe that Massachusetts and New York, will respect the obligation which the federal compact imposes, and if they shall inadvertently transgress its limitations, that they will submit to the judicial authority, which expounds and enforces alike their rights and duties. It is on this principle that we have hitherto acted in the admission of new States. It is the doctrine of the Constitution, and Mr. L. believed the only Republican doctrine. He trusted that the House would distinguish between suspicion and wisdom. The enemies of the resolution allow that the moment after the Senators and Representatives from Missouri shall have been permitted to take their seats, the constitution of Missouri may be altered, and that Congress will have no power to prevent it. What is the value of a security which lasts but for a month? If the first constitution of a new State must not contain even a doubtful provision, under penalty of disfranchisement, while succeeding forms of Government, though they may be changed annually, will be safe from examination, the consequence is plain. Every new State will frame a constitution for this review of inspection, such as shall contain no clause to which Congress can object, and the adoption of those provisions, which are intended practically to direct the operations of the Government, will be postponed until our declaration that the State is admitted shall enable it to form a constitution without interference. Mr. L. said that the first constitution would be very short and plain; it would certainly contain no offensive feature, and hardly any feature at all; it might provide in three lines that there should be an Executive, a Legislature, a Judiciary, and that these should be elected by the people. A committee of this House would report that they could find nothing in the constitution to object to, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania would applaud their prudence in taking care not to extend the privileges of self-government to any portion of the people of this country, until they had given bond for their good behaviour.

In public or private life, he who parts with power or property, shows no wisdom in pretending still to regulate its disposition. It is prudent, as well as generous, to treat those who are about to become members of the Federal Union, with a frank and liberal confidence. Nothing can be more repugnant to the spirit of our institutions, or the practice of our Government, than a churlish and reluctant admission, which exacts security that it knows to be ineffectual, and employs the last moment of authority in proclaiming that it would willingly exert the power which it has engaged to abdicate. But he had gone a little further into this subject, (Mr. Lowndes said) than he had intended at this time. He thought that the House must admit, and as yet he contended for nothing more—that Congress has, under the Constitution, a right to admit States by a prospective law.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. SERGEANT) had said, peremptorily, that "Congress has never admitted a State by anticipation." Mr. L. observed, that when he had first spoken in support of the resolution before the Committee of the Whole, as he could not exactly know the character of the objections which would be opposed to it, he had endeavored rather to develop principles, than to apply them; and had referred to the evidence, by which material facts were established, without quoting, or even fully stating them. The gentleman from Pennsylvania had found it easy to elude his principles, and to deny his facts.

The acts by which Congress had admitted States, prospectively, were material to a just decision of the resolution, and Mr. Lowndes referred to them, with a higher view than that of proving the gentleman from Pennsylvania to be wrong. The House must bear with him while on this argument he found it necessary to quote the words of laws to which he had before referred.

The act admitting Kentucky into the Union, (Laws of the U. S., vol. 2, p. 122,) in its first section, enacts and declares, that the district of Kentucky shall, upon the first day of June, 1792, be formed into a new State, &c., and its second section is in these words: "And be it further enacted and declared, that upon the aforesaid first day of June, 1792, the said new State, by the name and style of the State of Kentucky, shall be received and admitted into the Union, as a new and entire member of the United States of America." The act was passed on the 4th February, 1791. Congress was not even in session in June, 1792. Kentucky was admitted without any further act by Congress, in virtue of the law of 1791; and this law of prospective admission has given her all the rights of a State, or she has them not now.

So in respect to Vermont, a law passed on the 18th of February, 1791, enacts and declares, that, on the 4th day of March, 1791, the State of Vermont shall be received and admitted into this Union as a new and entire member of the United States of America. Vermont is not now a State unless this be an act of admission.

In these two instances of the admission of new States, (the first which occurred under the Constitution,) the words "shall be received and admitted" must be confessed to imply the perfect acquisition of the rights and duties of members of the Confederacy, at the time designated in the act. They looked to no further agency or confirmation of Congress. The words are used as synonymous with "shall become;" and the two States by virtue of acts which declare that "they shall be admitted" on days on which Congress did not sit, and could not act, actually became States of the American Union on those days.

It is in defiance of these examples, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania tells us that "a State has never been admitted by anticipation."

Mr. L. said that, before he examined the example of Ohio, he must notice an observation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania which seemed calculated to throw rather a ludicrous air upon any argument which might be employed to prove that Missouri is a State of right. If, indeed, she be a State, what are we doing; about what are we deliberating; why pass a resolution if she be a State without it?

To answer a merely verbal argument, it is enough to explain the words of a proposition. Mr. L. believed that, under the law of the last session without any act upon our part, Missouri had a right to form a State government, and to administer it; to elect her Senators and Representative to Congress, and that her Senators and Representative had a right to seats in this and the other House. He should consider these propositions, at first, without reference to the supposed repugnance between the constitutions of Missouri and of the United States, or to the proviso in the fourth section of the act. But he had not forgotten the proviso, and gentlemen might be very sure that he would not evade its consideration.

He asked of the House that it would apply the objections of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the propositions which he had stated. He would try them only upon the last, for he was really sorry that this style of argument should be introduced into the public councils. It seemed, according to this objection, that, if the Representative and Senators had a right to their seats, there was something absurd in our deliberating whether they had the right or not. Does not the gentleman from Pennsylvania know that the clearest rights may be disputed and denied? Is it, then, absurd to propose that these rights shall be recognised, and their exercise be allowed? If Missouri be a State already, it is true that we cannot proceed to make her so; but may we not declare her to be such—may we not treat her as such? Mr. L. said he had not attempted to enter into the inquiry, what forms of recognition were necessary (or whether any were) to extend to a new State, in our courts and elsewhere, all the privileges of its condition. If any form of recognition be necessary for the practical enjoyment of these advantages, the State has a right to claim that this form of recognition shall be employed.

Among individuals those rights only may be considered as perfect, which can be maintained in a court of justice. Claims upon the United States, whether political or pecuniary, are not susceptible of this legal distinction. Against them there can be no right more perfect than that which is founded upon a compact proposed by them as the one party, and formally accepted by the other.

But, Mr. L. said, he had done the gentleman from Pennsylvania some injustice. His argument was a little more plausible than he had represented it to be. He construed the resolution before the House as if it contained the words Missouri "is hereby admitted," and then reasoned in very logical form, that, if she were admitted by the resolution, she could not have been admitted before it.

Mr. L. said, that, when he had heard this criticism, he had supposed that he should be obliged frankly to allow that he had drawn the resolution very carelessly, and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (a member of the committee which reported it,) by prudently withholding this objection to its form, had secured every fair advantage in attacking it. For once, however, he had found himself too ready to admit an error. The resolution pronounces that Missouri is hereby—not admitted—but declared to be admitted; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to adapt his argument to the fact, must convince the House that it is absurd, when a State has become one of the United States, to declare that she is so.

After all, however, the important questions were those which regarded not the words of the resolution, (which it was as easy to amend as to criticise,) but the rights of Missouri. He thought that these rights would be strongly illustrated by examining the admission of Ohio into the Union.

In her case, as in those of Vermont and Kentucky, the act was one of prospective admission; to take effect, however, not at a fixed time, but upon the occurrence of a particular contingency. To the admission of a State, the consent of two parties (of Congress and of the State itself) is necessary. In the cases of Vermont and Kentucky, the consent of the State had been expressed before the passage of the act of Congress. The admission, therefore, by the act, was absolute, though prospective. In the case of Ohio, and of all the territories which have since become States, the act of Congress has been passed before the consent of the State, or of the people in convention, has been obtained; and the admission by the act has been not prospective only, but contingent. He would proceed to show by the conduct of Congress, and its language, upon what contingency it depended, that the State should become one of the United States.

He submitted to the House that where a form of words had been used by Congress, and these words have been the subject of legislative construction, where the same words and the same construction has been employed at successive sessions, the Congress which continues to use the same language, designs to authorize the same construction. He did not employ the authority of a subsequent Congress to determine what was meant by an earlier one; but he insisted that when Congress, at its last session, used the words of the act for authorizing the people of Ohio to form a State government, and applied them to Missouri, they intended that the new law should be interpreted as the old one had been. This was only to say of sentences as of words, that their meaning must be determined by their use.

Mr. L. read the first section of the act for the admission of Ohio into the Union, which he said was in the same words (as far as its application to a different territory permitted) with that passed at the last session, for the admission of Missouri. "Be it enacted, &c., That the inhabitants of the eastern division of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, be, and they are hereby, authorized to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and to assume such name as they shall deem proper; and the said State, when formed, shall be admitted into the Union, upon the same footing with the original States, in all respects whatever." (Laws of the U. S. 3d vol. 496.) What was the construction put upon this law? He would read it in an act of the same volume. It is found in the preamble to the act "to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States, within the State of Ohio," vol. 3, p. 524, which recites that "the people of the eastern division of the territory northwest of the river Ohio, did, on the twenty-ninth day of November, one thousand eight hundred and two, form for themselves a constitution and State government, and did give to the said State the name of the State of Ohio, whereby the said State has become one of the United States."

We have then the solemn decision of Congress that Ohio, by forming its constitution, became one of the United States, without any further act by the legislative body. Congress accordingly proceeded to execute the agreement, which, having been proposed by one party, and adopted by the other, had become obligatory on both. It was with these acts on our tables that we passed the law of the last session. It was in the same words that we authorized Missouri "to form a State government." She has formed it, and thereby "has become one of the United States." Such is the language of the statute book.

The same form of words has been always since employed, in regard to the territories which have successively become States, with the exception of Louisiana, whose situation was supposed to be peculiar. The officers, judicial and executive, of the United States, have been superseded, in all of these instances, by those of the new State, and elections have been held for members of Congress, without waiting for any further act of the General Government. This, which Congress knew to have been done in every former instance, they must have intended should be done in this. But, it may be said, that occurrences in a remote territory may have passed unobserved, or that the fact of every officer of the United States being removed, and the independent government of a State being established and administered before its new constitution was submitted to examination, was rather acquiesced in than approved. Even this distinction cannot be sustained, without inconsistency, by the opponents of the resolution. They say that the constitutions of all these States have been examined and approved by Congress. Now, there is in all of them an article which fixes the period at which the operations of the new State government shall commence, and the election of members of Congress take place, and this period was in all of them earlier than the sessions of Congress which occurred after those constitutions were formed. Thus, Alabama, (for he would not fatigue the House by more remote examples) was authorized to form a State government in 1819, in the same words as Missouri was in 1820. The constitution of Alabama was formed in July, 1819, and by what is called its schedule superseded from its date all that authority over the State which the General Government had before possessed over the Territory of Alabama—directed that all criminal actions should be prosecuted in the name of the State, and provided that, on the third Monday of September, 1819, a new Governor, members of Assembly, and a Representative to Congress, should be elected. In short, it provided that, without any further act by Congress, Alabama should cease to be a Territory, and become a State. This was the construction of the act to authorize Alabama to form a State government, which her convention had given and acted on; and, if Congress had, indeed, examined her constitution, this was the construction which Congress has sanctioned. It was at the same session that they gave to Missouri the same right to form a State government which had before been given to Alabama, and in the same words. They intended then that Missouri, like Alabama, should form and administer her State government, and elect her members of Congress, without waiting for the recognition of the General Government.

That he might not be suspected of avoiding the consideration of an example which might be supposed to discountenance his views, he would advert for a moment to the case of Louisiana. In authorizing every other territory to form a State government, Congress had adopted the form and the words of the act which he had quoted in the case of Ohio. But, in respect to Louisiana, they authorized the convention to form a constitution; but provided that, if the constitution were not disapproved by Congress, she should be admitted as a State. It was doubted whether the large proportion of the inhabitants of Louisiana, born and bred under an arbitrary government, would understand or prefer that form of civil polity without which it would be unwise to make her a State. He had already expressed the opinion, that the formation of a provisional constitution, for the examination of Congress, was a nugatory and fallacious security for the future good behaviour of any people; but he had never denied that Congress had power to make the people of a territory pass through this exercise. In respect to Louisiana, they chose to exert it, and provided that "in case the convention should declare its assent in behalf of the people, to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and should form a constitution and State government," and "if the same should not be disapproved by Congress at their next session, the said State should be admitted into the Union upon the same footing with the original States." By this act Louisiana was to be admitted into the Union if her constitution was approved, and after it was approved. He freely conceded that Congress possessed the discretionary power of determining whether the State should be admitted with the constitution which she proposed for approbation—they possessed, because they had reserved it. Congress had before them, at their last session, the examples of Ohio and Louisiana. In the first example, an act had passed under which the Territory was authorized to form a constitution and State government, "whereby she became a State." In the other, the authority was substantially to propose a constitution, on the approbation of which, by Congress, she was to become a State. In choosing between these examples, Congress, at its last session, adopted the form which had been employed in respect to Ohio; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania was obliged to contend, not merely that the clause in respect to Missouri should be construed differently from an identical clause in respect to Ohio; but that it should be construed in the same way with an entirely different clause, which had been adopted for peculiar reasons in the case of Louisiana, which Congress had purposely omitted in every other case, and which they had directly rejected at the last session, when it was moved by a member from New York. Against such interpretations there could be no safety.

He had proved these two propositions, that Missouri had a right to form and administer its government, and a right to elect its members of Congress. It would seem to follow that the members whom she elected would be entitled to take their seats. The Federal Constitution gives to a State, and only to a State, the right to elect Senators and Representatives. Whatever community is proved to be a State of the Union, must have a right to elect Representatives to Congress, and it seems equally clear that the community which has a right to elect Representatives to Congress, must be a State of the Union. But the same conclusion was supported by another view.

He concurred in opinion with those gentlemen who thought that it was never intended, by Congress, to give to Missouri the power of becoming an independent community. They meant, by the act of the last session, to consolidate the empire, and not contract it. He had proved that we had authorized the establishment of a State government in Missouri, over which we had reserved no control; he supposed that it was not designed to leave the parts of the empire without connexion, even for a moment; and when the territorial condition was removed, there was but one possible connexion which could be substituted—the connexion between a State and the Confederacy.

But it may be said that if the fact of a government being administered, and members elected by the new States, under a law declaring that they should be admitted, prove that Congress intended that the government of Missouri should be administered, and her elections held without any further act by this body, the same examples show that the members elected should not be received without an act of recognition.

Mr. L. allowed that, for three years past, and only for three years, the members from new States had not proceeded to take their seats until the passage of a joint resolution declaring the admission of the States which they represented. In the case of Indiana, when such a resolution was first proposed, he had before remarked that the Representative took his seat on the second, while the resolution did not pass until the eleventh of the month. His taking his seat might, if you please, have been an act of inadvertence; but that word must have lost its meaning, if it can be applied to the conduct of the House which allowed him to keep his seat for the whole time he had mentioned, and to keep it while they were obliged to vote upon the very question, whether the State of Indiana should be declared to be admitted into the Union.

If example could prove any thing, it proved that recognition, by Congress sometimes employed, but oftener omitted, was not necessary to give to Missouri the rights of a State. Recognition, indeed, from the plain import of the word, does not give rights, but declares them. He did not doubt that the acts of the new State might be properly examined to determine whether she had accepted the terms proposed, and become a State; and the credentials of the Representative, to know whether he had become a member. Congress might, by law, or perhaps, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes, by usage, require a certain form of examination; but this would ascertain and authenticate the right. It would not create it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania had said that there was every variety in the mode of admitting States. If this were true, it would yet follow, as all of these are allowed to have been legal, and as many of the States were admitted prospectively, and without recognition, that Missouri has acquired the rights of a State in the same way. But he did not object to recognition, but proposed it; if it were necessary to the practical enjoyment of the rights of a State, the first right of Missouri was, that this recognition should be made.

DECEMBER, 1820.

Admission of Missouri.

H. OF R.

The examples of admission were not, however, as various and irregular as they were represented. Under different circumstances, there were indeed different forms. When the wish of the people to constitute a State government, had been clearly and formally expressed by a convention, the act of admission has been generally absolute; sometimes, however, immediate, and sometimes prospective. When the consent of the people of the proposed State has not been already fully given and is therefore formally required, the admission is always made contingent upon that consent, and is always prospective. Every act, however, for authorizing the people of a territory to form a State government for themselves, adopts general principles, and uses words, which make a compact obligatory upon the United States, before any act of recognition by Congress, and even before the actual formation of a State constitution. He should quote the Missouri act to establish this position presently, but similar clauses were found in all the acts.

Mr. L. said that he considered himself as having proved that Congress has the right of admitting States prospectively; that this right had been legitimately exercised in the case of Vermont and Kentucky, by acts which were to take effect upon the lapse of a certain time, and in the cases of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Mississippi, Alabama, and Missouri, that the same right of prospective admission had been exercised, in acts which were to take effect upon a future contingency. This contingency, according to the solemn construction which he had quoted in the case of Ohio, was the formation of a constitution and State government, "whereby she became a State." But he must now inquire, whether the authority given to Missouri by the act of the last session, had not been dependent upon a condition which had defeated the grant? It became necessary, with this view, to examine the proviso in the fourth section.

He thought its import plain, but gentlemen supposed that it involved a deep legal question. The House would remember, that the first section of the act of the last session had authorized the people of Missouri to form for themselves a constitution and State government, and had enacted, that the State, when formed, should be admitted into the Union. The fourth section required that the convention of Missouri should determine whether it were expedient to form a constitution and State government. If it were determined to be expedient, the convention might either themselves form, or provide for the election of representatives who should form a State constitution. After this provision follows the clause "provided the same shall be republican, and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States." The opposers of the resolution insisted, that if Missouri was authorized to form no other constitution than one which should not be repugnant to that of the United States, she could derive no right from the law if such repugnance subsisted. In other words, (for it was difficult to examine the doctrines without employing the terms of law) that the formation of a constitution, which should not be repugnant to that of the United States, was the condition precedent, upon which the right of Missouri to admission into the Union should accrue. They represent, indeed, all the rights which the act of the last session confers upon Missouri, as dependent upon the same condition.

Mr. L. said, that he had remarked, already, that the terms of that law made a part of the compact which it proposes, obligatory upon the United States, even before the formation of the State constitution.

The convention was not required to form a constitution, but first to determine whether a State government should be formed; and, if it should be determined to form one, Congress enacted that the terms of compact stated in the 6th section of the act should be proposed to the convention. If the formation of a State constitution were then left, as it might be, to a different body and different time, the compact would be perfected (it would be "obligatory upon the United States") before any State constitution existed. This compact gave rights which neither party could at pleasure withdraw; it established the relations which are usual between the General Government and the States formed out of its territories, and explicitly considered the convention as acting with the authority, and in the name of the State. A much stronger conclusion might be drawn from it, but he was satisfied to say that it proved that Missouri, under the act of the last session, had acquired very important rights before she had proceeded to consider even the first clause of her constitution.

But the words of the proviso were not susceptible of a construction which would make the conformity of her constitution the condition precedent upon which she should acquire the rights of a State. He had hoped that a friend, whose professional studies would have enabled him to do it most effectually, would have shown that the construction which even a technical lawyer would place upon the proviso could not support the objection to the resolution. To read the proviso was enough to show that it was not intended to avoid every other act of the convention, because it should exceed or mistake its powers in a single clause. Missouri was authorized to form a constitution, provided the same was republican and not repugnant to the Constitution of the United States. The clause presented, at least to the unlearned reader, no other import than this. The authority given to form a constitution must be subject to all the limitations imposed by the paramount authority of the Federal Constitution. The same limitations would have existed, though a superfluous caution had not in words expressed them. They applied to every old State as well as to this new one, and their terms neither assigned any new penalty for transgression, nor a new tribunal to ascertain and punish it.

He knew that it was often difficult to determine what was a condition precedent, but, ignorant as he was of law, he would show that the proviso contained none. That the proviso contained a condition precedent, would imply at least this proposition—that the performance of some previous act was necessary to the acquisition of the rights conferred by this section. The only right conferred in the whole section was that of forming a constitution and State government. Now, that the conformity of such a constitution, after it should be framed, should be the condition upon which the convention should be authorized to begin and form it, was a contradiction in terms which the dexterity of the whole bar would be unable to reconcile. It would be flattery to call it a sophism.

The right to form a constitution and State government, then, has been acquired, or, if gentlemen prefer the term has been vested. Has it been lost? It would be a new doctrine in this country—a strange one anywhere—that the mistake of a public body in the construction of a difficult power should not merely defeat the act which they wanted authority to perform, but should annul every other provision, though clearly within their competence, and even divest the people whom they represented of power to correct the error. We have learned, indeed, in our infancy, that governments may be abdicated and sovereigns deposed; but we have yet to learn that the people of a State may forfeit all the rights of self-government by an error of their representatives; and that the process of disfranchisement may be enforced by the Congress of the United States, and take place under the forms their constitution.

Mr. L. observed that he had as yet said nothing of the particular clause in the constitution of Missouri which all the opposers of the resolution believe to be repugnant to the Federal Constitution. "It shall be the duty of the Legislature to pass such laws as may be necessary to prevent free negroes and mulattoes from coming to and settling in the State." It had been insisted that the black citizen had a right, under the Federal Constitution, to come to any State and settle there. His friends from Virginia and Delaware (Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. McLANE) had argued, with distinguished ability, that no federal privileges had been conferred upon that degraded caste of our population, rejected as they were, in every State, from social and political privileges, either by the provisions of law or the feelings of society. If these gentlemen were right, there was certainly no repugnance between the Constitutions of the United States and Missouri; but, if they were mistaken, did the exclusion of free blacks and mulattoes apply only to that large class who can in no propriety of language be considered as the citizens of any State, or did it include the small and more favored class, whose characteristic of color would confound them with that description from which the privilege of citizenship would elevate and distinguish them? He had before submitted the suggestion that the constitution of Missouri was legitimate in nearly the whole operation which the broadest interpretation would give it, and that the authority which should expound that constitution would be bound so to limit its construction as to except from the generality of its terms the few who were protected from its application by the Constitution of the United States. If any of those gentlemen who have spoken against the resolution were called, in a judicial character, to expound the doubtful clause in the Missouri constitution, they would value their professional reputation too highly not to exclude from its operation the black citizen of the United States, if any such should appear before them. On this part of the subject, as indeed on every other which his friend before him (Mr. ARCHER) had touched, he had left no other resource but silence to opponents who would not acknowledge their error. Why had not the gentlemen who objected to the constitution of Missouri because, in imposing restraints upon the free blacks and mulattoes, it had made no exceptions in respect to citizens, explained, when they were asked to do it, the meaning of their own act of the last session, liable as it was to the same objection? He had been taught not to refer to sentences. He must quote a few from the act of the last session, to "incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington." "The corporation shall have full power and authority to restrain and prohibit the nightly and other disorderly meetings of slaves, free negroes and mulattoes, and to punish such free negroes and mulattoes by penalties not exceeding ten dollars for any one offence, and, in case of the inability of any such free negro and mulatto to pay any such penalty and cost thereon, to cause him or her to be confined to labor for any time not exceeding six calendar months." The corporation shall also have full power and authority "to prescribe the terms and conditions upon which free negroes and mulattoes may reside in the city." There was a fair claim upon the candor of gentlemen who oppose the resolution, to say what they had meant by the act which he had quoted; what they had meant by the law on which they had voted, and for which they had voted. Did they mean that these penalties of fines and imprisonment and labor should be imposed upon the citizen if he were black? Did they mean that the corporation should prescribe the terms upon which alone the citizen who was black might reside in the metropolis of his country? There was no difference between the assumption of such a right and that of excluding the black citizens entirely. But if gentlemen would not choose to say what they meant, he would declare for himself that, in the use of general terms referring to blacks and mulattoes as a class, that portion which may be distinguished from the rest by the privilege of citizenship, never entered into his contemplation. He asked for Missouri, not the indulgence, but the justice of the House. Was it fair to require from a convention hastily collected a degree of precision and accuracy which the Congress of the United States did not employ? In a constitution which contained in a few pages the distribution of powers, and, if he might say so, the elements of future legislation, was it fair to expect a fulness of detail and an exactness of limitation, such as the men who criticised it had been unable to accomplish in an ordinary law? In short, if we had forgotten to make, in terms, the exception in favor of citizens who were black, and left their rights to the security of sound judicial construction, was not the omission as pardonable in the case of Missouri, and the security of the black citizen as good?

If the constitution of Missouri, by a fair and liberal interpretation, were not repugnant to that of the United States, there was no pretence for rejecting the resolution before the House. Even if the arguments of gentlemen from whom he differed were correct, there is no obscurity of language, no defect of provision, nothing but direct repugnance, which could justify the rejection of the constitution. He had endeavored to show that this repugnance did not exist; but, if it did, no political truth was clearer to his mind than that it should be ascertained and corrected by a judicial tribunal. In authorizing Missouri to form a constitution and State Government, Congress had proposed the terms upon which they were willing that she should become a member of the Confederacy. The consent of both parties was necessary to the compact. It imposed duties and restraints upon both. If Congress should fail to construe or fulfil well any part of its engagements with the new States, no man would be rash enough to say that all their obligations were annulled; if the new States misconstrued or violated any part of their engagements, could Congress plead that its own obligations had become void?

Gentlemen say that Missouri was enjoined by the law of the last session to frame a constitution which should not be repugnant to that of the Union: and they are right. This was the rule prescribed for her government. But the compact proposed to Missouri, provided not the rule only, but the tribunal which should expound and enforce it. Under this compact the Constitution of the United States was to be "the supreme law" of Missouri; her Legislature and judges were to be sworn to support it, and the judicial power of the United States was to decide, in the last resort, every question which should arise under the Federal Constitution. She can have no right to pass a law denying to the citizens of other States, "all the privileges and immunities" of citizens of Missouri; but she has a right to have her laws expounded by the tribunal provided by the Constitution. She has signed the article proposed by yourselves, which provides that if she pass an unconstitutional law, it shall be annulled by your courts. The very casus fœderis exists, and instead of carrying into effect the provisions which you yourselves proposed, you make the circumstance which was foreseen and provided for the pretext for annulling the whole compact.

We are so far from being bound, then, to determine whether the constitution of a new State is repugnant to that of the Union, that we cannot pronounce such a determination without usurping the powers of that tribunal to which we are engaged to remit it. We cannot, indeed, be bound by the terms of the Federal Constitution, to examine the statutes of a new State, if we are authorized, as he had proved we were, to admit States by a prospective law. Congress could not know what their constitutions might be at the time when such acts of admission would take effect.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, and those who followed him, have, indeed, endeavored to show that we are bound, before we admit a State, to approve its constitution. But their whole proof, however various in their forms, resolves itself into the suggestion of cases of strong repugnance between the Federal and State constitutions. There ought to be a remedy for these. We say that there is one; that wherever a State, whether new or old, shall violate the compact which defines her rights and powers, the courts of the United States will correct the procedure, if, from the nature of the case, it can be subjected to judicial cognizance. But if it cannot, if the act of the State do not directly impugn any individual right, but affect those political principles which the people of the United States have submitted to the guardianship of the General Government, (if it should establish, according to the illustration of the gentleman from New York, Mr. STORRS, an hereditary House of Lords,) the constitution even here contains the preservative power which is to guard it from corruption. When the judges cannot interpose, Congress may, and this either with a new or an old State. "The United States guaranty to every State a republican form of government."

Gentlemen had fatigued themselves in the suggestion of possible cases, where the disorders of a State constitution might admit of no cure but from the interposition of Congress. He would not detain the House by suppositions; but if there were a thousand cases where its interposition were necessary, they would not weaken the argument that it should not be resorted to without necessity. If the Legislature of Missouri are freely elected by the people; if her judges are sworn to support the Federal Constitution, and offer no obstruction to appeals to the Supreme Court, (whenever you provide for them,) may we not say that the errors of her constitution may be safely left to judicial correction; or do we abandon this doctrine when we admit that a State which should maintain an hereditary nobility, or a standing army in time of peace, must be restrained by harsher remedies?

Mr. L. said, that nothing but the previous excitement of the country, and the character of the right which Missouri was supposed to have impaired, could, in his judgment, have induced prudent and reflecting men to undertake to examine and determine the legitimacy of State constitutions. It happened that the right in dispute was one which interested the citizens of the different States, and did not affect the relative powers of the States and the General Government.
